

Agatha Christie

ONE, TWO, BUCKLE MY SHOE

Agatha Christie

Agatha Christie

The novel uses the variant, 'Five, six, picking up sticks'.

One, Two,

Buckle My Shoe

To Dorothy North

who likes detective stories and cream, in the hope it may make up to her for the absence of the latter!

One, two, buckle my shoe,

Three, four, shut the door,

Five, six, picking up sticks,

Seven, eight, lay them straight,

Nine, ten, a good fat hen,

Eleven, twelve, men must delve,

Thirteen, fourteen, maids are courting,

Fifteen, sixteen, maids in the kitchen,

Seventeen, eighteen, maids in waiting,

Nineteen, twenty, my plate's empty...

Contents

About Agatha Christie

The Agatha Christie Collection

E-book Extras

Chapters 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10

www.agathachristie.com

About the Publisher

One, Two,

Buckle my Shoe

I

Mr Morley was not in the best of tempers at breakfast. He complained of the bacon, wondered why the coffee had to have the appearance of liquid mud, and remarked that breakfast cereals were each one worse than the last.

Mr Morley was a small man with a decided jaw and a pugnacious chin. His sister, who kept house for him, was a large woman rather like a female grenadier. She eyed her brother thoughtfully and asked whether the bath water had been cold again.

Rather grudgingly, Mr Morley said it had not.

He glanced at the paper and remarked that the Government seemed to be passing from a state of incompetence to one of positive imbecility!

Miss Morley said in a deep bass voice that it was Disgraceful!

As a mere woman she had always found whatever Government happened to be in power distinctly useful. She urged her brother on to explain why the Government's present policy was inconclusive, idiotic, imbecile and frankly suicidal!

When Mr Morley had expressed himself fully on these points, he had a second cup of the despised coffee and unburdened himself of his true grievance.

'These girls,' he said, 'are all the same! Unreliable, self-centred—not to be depended on in any way.'

Miss Morley said interrogatively:

'Gladys?'

'I've just had the message. Her aunt's had a stroke and she's had to go down to Somerset.'

Miss Morley said:

'Very trying, dear, but after all hardly the girl's fault.'

Mr Morley shook his head gloomily.

'How do I know the aunt has had a stroke? How do I know the whole thing hasn't been arranged between the girl and that very unsuitable young fellow she goes about with? That young man is a wrong

'un if I ever saw one! They've probably planned some outing together for today.'

'Oh, no, dear, I don't think Gladys would do a thing like that. You know, you've always found her very conscientious.'

'Yes, yes.'

'An intelligent girl and really keen on her work, you said.'

'Yes, yes, Georgina, but that was before this undesirable young man came along. She's been quite different lately—quite different—absent-minded—upset—nervy.'

The Grenadier produced a deep sigh. She said:

'After all, Henry, girls do fall in love. It can't be helped.'

Mr Morley snapped:

'She oughtn't to let it affect her efficiency as my secretary. And today, in particular, I'm extremely busy!

Several very important patients. It is most trying!'

'I'm sure it must be extremely vexing, Henry. How is the new boy shaping, by the way?'

Henry Morley said gloomily:

'He's the worst I've had yet! Can't get a single name right and has the most uncouth manners. If he doesn't improve I shall sack him and try again. I don't know what's the good of our education nowadays. It seems to turn out a collection of nit-wits who can't understand a single thing you say to them, let alone remember it.'

He glanced at his watch.

'I must be getting along. A full morning, and that Sainsbury Seale woman to fit in somewhere as she is in pain. I suggested that she should see Reilly, but she wouldn't hear of it.'

'Of course not,' said Georgina loyally.

'Reilly's very able—very able indeed. First-class diplomas. Thoroughly up-to-date in his work.'

'His hand shakes,' said Miss Morley. 'In my opinion hedrinks.'

Her brother laughed, his good temper restored. He said:

'I'll be up for a sandwich at half-past one as usual.'

II

At the Savoy Hotel Mr Amberiotis was picking his teeth with a toothpick and grinning to himself. Everything was going very nicely.

He had had his usual luck. Fancy those few kind words of his to that idiotic hen of a woman being so richly repaid. Oh! well—cast your bread upon the waters. He had always been a kind-hearted man. And generous! In the future he would be able to be even more generous. Benevolent visions floated before his eyes. Little Dimitri... And the good Constantopolus struggling with his little restaurant... What pleasant surprises for them...

The toothpick probed unguardedly and Mr Amberiotis winced. Rosy visions of the future faded and gave way to apprehensions of the immediate future. He explored tenderly with his tongue. He took out his notebook. Twelve o'clock. 58, Queen Charlotte Street.

He tried to recapture his former exultant mood. But in vain. The horizon had shrunk to six bare words:

'58, Queen Charlotte Street. Twelve o'clock.'

III

At the Glengowrie Court Hotel, South Kensington, breakfast was over. In the lounge, Miss Sainsbury Seale was sitting talking to Mrs Bolitho. They occupied adjacent tables in the dining-room and had made friends the day after Miss Sainsbury Seale's arrival a week ago.

Miss Sainsbury Seale said:

'You know, dear, it really has stopped aching! Not a twinge! I think perhaps I'll ring up—'

Mrs Bolitho interrupted her.

'Now don't be foolish, my dear. You go to the dentist and get it over.'

Mrs Bolitho was a tall, commanding female with a deep voice. Miss Sainsbury Seale was a woman of forty odd with indecisively bleached hair rolled up in untidy curls. Her clothes were shapeless and rather artistic, and her pince-nez were always dropping off. She was a great talker. She said now wistfully:

‘But really, you know, it doesn’t acheat all .’

‘Nonsense, you told me you hardly slept a wink last night.’

‘No, I didn’t—no, indeed—but perhaps,now , the nerve has actuallydied .’

‘All the more reason to go to the dentist,’ said Mrs Bolitho firmly. ‘We all like to put it off, but that’s just cowardice. Better make up one’s mind andget it over !’

Something hovered on Miss Sainsbury Seale’s lips. Was it the rebellious murmur of: ‘Yes, but it’s not your tooth!’

All she actually said, however, was:

‘I expect you’re right. And Mr Morley is such a careful man and really never hurts oneat all .’

IV

The meeting of the Board of Directors was over. It had passed off smoothly. The report was good. There should have been no discordant note. Yet to the sensitive Mr Samuel Rotherstein there had been something , some nuance in the chairman’s manner.

There had been, once or twice, a shortness, an acerbity, in his tone—quite uncalled for by the proceedings.

Some secret worry, perhaps? But somehow Rotherstein could not connect a secret worry with Alistair Blunt. He was such an unemotional man. He was so very normal. So essentially British. There was, of course, always liver...Mr Rotherstein’s liver gave him a bit of trouble from time to time. But he’d never known Alistair complain of his liver. Alistair’s health was as sound as his brain and his grasp of finance. It was not annoying heartiness—just quiet well-being. And yet—there wassomething —once or twice the chairman’s hand had wandered to his face. He had sat supporting his chin. Not his normal attitude. And once or twice he had seemed actually—yes,distract . They came out of the board room and passed down the stairs.

Rotherstein said:

‘Can’t give you a lift, I suppose?’

Alistair Blunt smiled and shook his head.

‘My car’s waiting.’ He glanced at his watch. ‘I’m not going back to the city.’ He paused. ‘As a matter of fact I’ve got an appointment with the dentist.’

The mystery was solved.

V

Hercule Poirot descended from his taxi, paid the man and rang the bell of 58, Queen Charlotte Street. After a little delay it was opened by a boy in page-boy’s uniform with a freckled face, red hair, and an earnest manner.

Hercule Poirot said:

‘Mr Morley?’

There was in his heart a ridiculous hope that Mr Morley might have been called away, might be indisposed, might not be seeing patients today...All in vain. The page-boy drew back, Hercule Poirot stepped inside, and the door closed behind him with the quiet remorselessness of unalterable doom. The boy said: ‘Name, please?’

Poirot gave it to him, a door on the right of the hall was thrown open and he stepped into the waiting-room.

It was a room furnished in quiet good taste and, to Hercule Poirot, indescribably gloomy. On the polished (reproduction) Sheraton table were carefully arranged papers and periodicals. The (reproduction) Hepplewhite sideboard held two Sheffield plated candlesticks and anépergne . The mantelpiece held a bronze clock and two bronze vases. The windows were shrouded by curtains of blue velvet. The chairs were upholstered in a Jacobean design of red birds and flowers. In one of them sat a military-looking gentleman with a fierce moustache and a yellow complexion. He looked at Poirot with an air of one considering some noxious insect. It was not so much his gun he looked as though he wished he had with him, as his Flit spray. Poirot, eyeing him with distaste, said to himself, 'In verity, there are some Englishmen who are altogether so unpleasing and ridiculous that they should have been put out of their misery at birth.'

The military gentleman, after a prolonged glare, snatched up The Times , turned his chair so as to avoid seeing Poirot, and settled down to read it.

Poirot picked up Punch .

He went through it meticulously, but failed to find any of the jokes funny. The page-boy came in and said, 'Colonel Arrow-Bumby?'—and the military gentleman was led away. Poirot was speculating on the probabilities of there really being such a name, when the door opened to admit a young man of about thirty.

As the young man stood by the table, restlessly flicking over the covers of magazines, Poirot looked at him sideways. An unpleasant and dangerous looking young man, he thought, and not impossibly a murderer. At any rate he looked far more like a murderer than any of the murderers Hercule Poirot had arrested in the course of his career.

The page-boy opened the door and said to mid-air:

'Mr Peerer.'

Rightly construing this as a summons to himself, Poirot rose. The boy led him to the back of the hall and round the corner to a small lift in which he took him up to the second floor. Here he led him along a passage, opened a door which led into a little anteroom, tapped at a second door; and without waiting for a reply opened it and stood back for Poirot to enter.

Poirot entered to a sound of running water and came round the back of the door to discover Mr Morley washing his hands with professional gusto at a basin on the wall. VI

There are certain humiliating moments in the lives of the greatest of men. It has been said that no man is a hero to his valet. To that may be added that few men are heroes to themselves at the moment of visiting their dentist.

Hercule Poirot was morbidly conscious of this fact.

He was a man who was accustomed to have a good opinion of himself. He was Hercule Poirot, superior in most ways to other men. But in this moment he was unable to feel superior in any way whatever. His morale was down to zero. He was just that ordinary, craven figure, a man afraid of the dentist's chair. Mr Morley had finished his professional ablutions. He was speaking now in his encouraging professional manner.

'Hardly as warm as it should be, is it, for the time of year?'

Gently he led the way to the appointed spot—to The Chair! Deftly he played with its head rest, running it up and down.

Hercule Poirot took a deep breath, stepped up, sat down and relaxed his head to Mr Morley's professional fiddlings.

'There,' said Mr Morley with hideous cheerfulness. 'That quite comfortable? Sure?'

In sepulchral tones Poirot said that it was quite comfortable.

Mr Morley swung his little table nearer, picked up his little mirror, seized an instrument and prepared to get on with the job.

Hercule Poirot grasped the arms of the chair, shut his eyes and opened his mouth.

‘Any special trouble?’ Mr Morley inquired.

Slightly indistinctly, owing to the difficulty of forming consonants while keeping the mouth open, Hercule Poirot was understood to say that there was no special trouble. This was, indeed, the twice yearly overhaul that his sense of order and neatness demanded. It was, of course, possible that there might be nothing to do...Mr Morley might, perhaps, overlook that second tooth from the back from which those twinges had come...Hemight—but it was unlikely—for Mr Morley was a very good dentist. Mr Morley passed slowly from tooth to tooth, tapping and probing, murmuring little comments as he did so.

‘That filling is wearing down a little—nothing serious, though. Gums are in pretty good condition, I’m glad to see.’ A pause at a suspect, a twist of the probe—no, on again, false alarm. He passed to the lower side. One, two—on to three?—No—‘The dog,’ Hercule Poirot thought in confused idiom, ‘has seen the rabbit!’

‘A little trouble here. Not been giving you any pain? Hm, I’m surprised.’ The probe went on. Finally Mr Morley drew back, satisfied.

‘Nothing very serious. Just a couple of fillings—and a trace of decay on that upper molar. We can get it all done, I think, this morning.’

He turned on a switch and there was a hum. Mr Morley unhooked the drill and fitted a needle to it with loving care.

‘Guide me,’ he said briefly, and started the dread work.

It was not necessary for Poirot to avail himself of this permission, to raise a hand, to wince, or even to yell. At exactly the right moment, Mr Morley stopped the drill, gave the brief command ‘Rinse,’ applied a little dressing, selected a new needle and continued. The ordeal of the drill was terror rather than pain. Presently, while Mr Morley was preparing the filling, conversation was resumed.

‘Have to do this myself this morning,’ he explained. ‘Miss Nevill has been called away. You remember Miss Nevill?’

Poirot untruthfully assented.

‘Called away to the country by the illness of a relative. Sort of thing that does happen on a busy day. I’m behind-hand already this morning. The patient before you was late. Very vexing when that happens. It throws the whole morning out. Then I have to fit in an extra patient because she is in pain. I always allow a quarter of an hour in the morning in case that happens. Still, it adds to the rush.’

Mr Morley peered into his little mortar as he ground. Then he resumed his discourse.

‘I’ll tell you something that I’ve always noticed, M. Poirot. The big people—the important people—they’re always on time—never keep you waiting. Royalty, for instance. Most punctilious. And these big City men are the same. Now this morning I’ve got a most important man coming—Alistair Blunt!’

Mr Morley spoke the name in a voice of triumph.

Poirot, prohibited from speech by several rolls of cotton wool and a glass tube that gurgled under his tongue, made an indeterminate noise.

Alistair Blunt! Those were the names that thrilled nowadays. Not Dukes, not Earls, not Prime Ministers. No, plain Mr Alistair Blunt. A man whose face was almost unknown to the general public—a man who only figured in an occasional quiet paragraph. Not a spectacular person. Just a quiet nondescript Englishman who was the head of the greatest banking firm in England. A man of vast wealth. A man who said Yes and No to Governments. A man who lived a quiet, unobtrusive life and never appeared on a public platform or made speeches. Yet a man in whose hands lay supreme power. Mr Morley’s voice still held a reverent tone as he stood over Poirot ramming the filling home.

‘Always comes to his appointments absolutely on time. Often sends his car away and walks back to his office. Nice, quiet, unassuming fellow. Fond of golf and keen on his garden. You’d never dream he could buy up half Europe!’

Just like you and me.'

A momentary resentment rose in Poirot at this offhand coupling of names. Mr Morley was a good dentist, yes, but there were other good dentists in London. There was only one Hercule Poirot.

'Rinse, please,' said Mr Morley.

'It's the answer, you know, to their Hitlers and Mussolinis and all the rest of them,' went on Mr Morley, as he proceeded to tooth number two. 'We don't make a fuss over here. Look how democratic our King and Queen are. Of course, a Frenchman like you, accustomed to the Republican idea—'

'I ah nah a Frahah—I ah—ah a Benyon.'

'Tchut—tchut—' said Mr Morley sadly. 'We must have the cavity completely dry.' He puffed hot air relentlessly on it.

Then he went on:

'I didn't realize you were a Belgian. Very interesting. Very fine man, King Leopold, so I've always heard. I'm a great believer in the tradition of Royalty myself. The training is good, you know. Look at the remarkable way they remember names and faces. All the result of training—though of course some people have a natural aptitude for that sort of thing. I, myself, for instance. I don't remember names, but it's remarkable the way I never forget a face. One of my patients the other day, for instance—I've seen that patient before. The name meant nothing to me—but I said to myself at once, "Now where have I met you before?" I've not remembered yet—but it will come back to me—I'm sure of it. Just another rinse, please.'

The rinse accomplished, Mr Morley peered critically into his patient's mouth.

'Well, I think that seems all right. Just close—very gently...Quite comfortable? You don't feel the filling at all? Open again, please. No, that seems quite all right.'

Hercule Poirot descended, a free man.

'Well, goodbye, M. Poirot. Not detected any criminals in my house, I hope?'

Poirot said with a smile:

'Before I came up, every one looked to me like a criminal! Now, perhaps, it will be different!'

'Ah, yes, a great deal of difference between before and after! All the same, we dentists aren't such devils now as we used to be! Shall I ring for the lift for you?'

'No, no, I will walk down.'

'As you like—the lift is just by the stairs.'

Poirot went out. He heard the taps start to run as he closed the door behind him. He walked down the two flights of stairs. As he came to the last bend, he saw the Anglo-Indian Colonel being shown out. Not at all a bad-looking man, Poirot reflected mellowly. Probably a fine shot who had killed many a tiger. A useful man—a regular outpost of Empire.

He went into the waiting-room to fetch his hat and stick which he had left there. The restless young man was still there, somewhat to Poirot's surprise. Another patient, a man, was reading the Field. Poirot studied the young man in his newborn spirit of kindness. He still looked very fierce—and as though he wanted to do a murder—but not really a murderer, thought Poirot kindly. Doubtless, presently, this young man would come tripping down the stairs, his ordeal over, happy and smiling and wishing no ill to anyone.

The page-boy entered and said firmly and distinctly:

‘Mr Blunt.’

The man at the table laid down theField and got up. A man of middle height, of middle age, neither fat nor thin. Well dressed, quiet.

He went out after the boy.

One of the richest and most powerful men in England—but he still had to go to the dentist just like anybody else, and no doubt felt just the same as anybody else about it!

These reflections passing through his mind, Hercule Poirot picked up his hat and stick and went to the door. He glanced back as he did so, and the startled thought went through his mind that that young man must have very bad toothache indeed.

In the hall Poirot paused before the mirror there to adjust his moustaches, slightly disarranged as the result of Mr Morley’s ministrations.

He had just completed their arrangement to his satisfaction when the lift came down again and the page-boy emerged from the back of the hall whistling discordantly. He broke off abruptly at the sight of Poirot and came to open the front door for him.

A taxi had just drawn up before the house and a foot was protruding from it. Poirot surveyed the foot with gallant interest.

A neat ankle, quite a good quality stocking. Not a bad foot. But he didn’t like the shoe. A brand new patent leather shoe with a large gleaming buckle. He shook his head. Not chic—very provincial!

The lady got out of the taxi, but in doing so she caught her other foot in the door and the buckle was wrenched off. It fell tinkling on to the pavement. Gallantly, Poirot sprang forward and picked it up, restoring it with a bow.

Alas! Nearer fifty than forty. Pince-nez. Untidy yellow-grey hair—unbecoming clothes—those depressing art greens! She thanked him, dropping her pince-nez, then her handbag. Poirot, polite if no longer gallant, picked them up for her.

She went up the steps of 58, Queen Charlotte Street, and Poirot interrupted the taxi-driver’s disgusted contemplation of a meagre tip.

‘You are free,hein?’

The taxi-driver said gloomily: ‘Oh, I’mfree.’

‘So am I,’ said Hercule Poirot. ‘Free of care!’

He saw the taxi-man’s air of deep suspicion.

‘No, my friend, I am not drunk. It is that I have been to the dentist and I need not go again for six months. It is a beautiful thought.’

Three, Four,

Shut the Door

I

It was a quarter to three when the telephone rang.

Hercule Poirot was sitting in an easy-chair happily digesting an excellent lunch. He did not move when the bell rang but waited for the faithful George to come and take the call.

‘Eh bien?’ he said, as George, with a ‘Just a minute, sir,’ lowered the receiver.

‘It’s Chief Inspector Japp, sir.’

‘Aha?’

Poirot lifted the receiver to his ear.

‘Eh bien, mon vieux,’ he said. ‘How goes it?’

‘That you, Poirot?’

‘Naturally.’

‘I hear you went to the dentist this morning? Is that so?’

Poirot murmured:

‘Scotland Yard knows everything!’

‘Man of the name of Morley. 58, Queen Charlotte Street?’

‘Yes.’ Poirot’s voice had changed. ‘Why?’

‘It was a genuine visit, was it? I mean you didn’t go to put the wind up him or anything of that sort?’

‘Certainly not. I had three teeth filled if you want to know.’

‘What did he seem like to you—manner much as usual?’

‘I should say so, yes. Why?’

Japp’s voice was rigidly unemotional.

‘Because not very much later he shot himself.’

‘What?’

Japp said sharply:

‘That surprises you?’

‘Frankly, it does.’

Japp said:

‘I’m not too happy about it myself...I’d like to have a talk with you. I suppose you wouldn’t like to come round?’

‘Where are you?’

‘Queen Charlotte Street.’

Poirot said:

‘I will join you immediately.’

II

It was a police constable who opened the door of 58. He said respectfully:

‘M. Poirot?’

‘It’s I, myself.’

‘The Chief Inspector is upstairs. Second floor—you know it?’

Hercule Poirot said:

‘I was there this morning.’

There were three men in the room. Japp looked up as Poirot entered. He said:

‘Glad to see you, Poirot. We’re just going to move him. Like to see him first?’

A man with a camera who had been kneeling near the body got up.

Poirot came forward. The body was lying near the fireplace.

In death Mr Morley looked very much as he had looked in life. There was a little blackened hole just below his right temple. A small pistol lay on the floor near his outflung right hand. Poirot shook his head gently.

Japp said:

‘All right, you can move him now.’

They took Mr Morley away. Japp and Poirot were left alone.

Japp said:

‘We’re through all the routine. Finger-prints, etc.’

Poirot sat down. He said:

‘Tell me.’

Japp pursed his lips. He said:

‘He could have shot himself. He probably did shoot himself. There are only his finger-prints on the gun—but I’m not quite satisfied.’

‘What are your objections?’

‘Well, to begin with, there doesn’t seem to be any reason why he should shoot himself...He was in good health, he was making money, he hadn’t any worries that anyone knew of. He wasn’t mixed up with a woman—at least,’ Japp corrected himself cautiously, ‘as far as we know he wasn’t. He hasn’t been moody or depressed or unlike himself. That’s partly why I was anxious to hear what you said. You saw him this morning, and I wondered if you’d noticed anything.’

Poirot shook his head.

‘Nothing at all. He was—what shall I say—normality itself.’

‘Then that makes it odd, doesn’t it? Anyway, you wouldn’t think a man would shoot himself in the middle of business hours, so to speak. Why not wait till this evening? That would be the natural thing to do.’

Poirot agreed.

‘When did the tragedy occur?’

'Can't say exactly. Nobody seems to have heard the shot. But I don't think they would. There are two doors between here and the passage and they have baize fitted round the edges—to deaden the noise from the victims of the dental chair, I imagine.'

'Very probably. Patients under gas sometimes make a lot of noise.'

'Quite. And outside, in the street, there's plenty of traffic, so you wouldn't be likely to hear it out there.'

'When was it discovered?'

'Round about one-thirty—by the page-boy, Alfred Biggs. Not a very bright specimen, by all accounts. It seems that Morley's twelve-thirty patient kicked up a bit of a row at being kept waiting. About one-ten the boy came up and knocked. There was no answer and apparently he didn't dare come in. He'd got in a few rows already from Morley and he was nervous of doing the wrong thing. He went down again and the patient walked out in a huff at one-fifteen. I don't blame her. She'd been kept waiting three-quarters of an hour and she wanted her lunch.'

'Who was she?'

Japp grinned.

'According to the boy she was Miss Shirty—but from the appointment book her name was Kirby.'

'What system was there for showing up patients?'

'When Morley was ready for his next patient he pressed that buzzer over there and the boy then showed the patient up.'

'And Morley pressed the buzzer last?'

'At five minutes past twelve, and the boy showed up the patient who was waiting. Mr Amberiotis, Savoy Hotel, according to the appointment book.'

A faint smile came to Poirot's lips. He murmured:

'I wonder what our page-boy made of that name!'

'A pretty hash, I should say. We'll ask him presently if we feel like a laugh.'

Poirot said:

'And at what time did this Mr Amberiotis leave?'

'The boy didn't show him out, so he doesn't know...A good many patients just go down the stairs without ringing for the lift and let themselves out.'

Poirot nodded.

Japp went on:

'But I rang up the Savoy Hotel. Mr Amberiotis was quite precise. He said he looked at his watch as he closed the front door and it was then twenty-five minutes past twelve.'

'He could tell you nothing of importance?'

'No, all he could say was that the dentist had seemed perfectly normal and calm in his manner.'

'Eh bien,' said Poirot. 'Then that seems quite clear. Between five-and-twenty past twelve and half-past one something happened—and presumably nearer the former time.'

‘Quite. Because otherwise—’

‘Otherwise he would have pressed the buzzer for the next patient.’

‘Exactly. The medical evidence agrees with that for what it’s worth. The divisional surgeon examined the body—at twenty past two. He wouldn’t commit himself—they never do nowadays—too many individual idiosyncrasies, they say. But Morley couldn’t have been shot later than one o’clock, he says—probably considerably earlier—but he wouldn’t be definite.’

Poirot said thoughtfully:

‘Then at twenty-five minutes past twelve our dentist is a normal dentist, cheerful, urbane, competent. And after that? Despair—misery—what you will—and he shoots himself?’

‘It’s funny,’ said Japp. ‘You’ve got to admit, it’s funny.’

‘Funny,’ said Poirot, ‘is not the word.’

‘I know it isn’t really—but it’s the sort of thing one says. It’s odd, then, if you like that better.’

‘Was it his own pistol?’

‘No, it wasn’t. He hadn’t got a pistol. Never had had one. According to his sister there wasn’t such a thing in the house. There isn’t in most houses. Of course he might have bought it if he’d made up his mind to do away with himself. If so, we’ll soon know about it.’

Poirot asked:

‘Is there anything else that worries you?’

Japp rubbed his nose.

‘Well, there was the way he was lying. I wouldn’t say a man couldn’t fall like that—but it wasn’t quite right somehow! And there was just a trace or two on the carpet—as though something had been dragged along it.’

‘That, then, is decidedly suggestive.’

‘Yes, unless it was that dratted boy. I’ve a feeling that he may have tried to move Morley when he found him. He denies it, of course, but then he was scared. He’s that kind of young ass. The kind that’s always putting their foot in it and getting cursed, and so they come to lie about things almost automatically.’

Poirot looked thoughtfully round the room.

At the wash-basin on the wall behind the door, at the tall filing cabinet on the other side of the door. At the dental chair and surrounding apparatus near the window, then along to the fireplace and back to where the body lay; there was a second door in the wall near the fireplace. Japp had followed his glance. ‘Just a small office through there.’ He flung open the door. It was as he had said, a small room, with a desk, a table with a spirit lamp and tea apparatus and some chairs. There was no other door.

‘This is where his secretary worked,’ explained Japp. ‘Miss Nevill. It seems she’s away today.’

His eyes met Poirot’s. The latter said:

‘He told me, I remember. That again—might be a point against suicide?’

‘You mean she was got out of the way?’

Japp paused. He said:

'If it wasn't suicide, he was murdered. But why? That solution seems almost as unlikely as the other. He seems to have been a quiet, inoffensive sort of chap. Who would want to murder him?'

Poirot said:

'Who could have murdered him?'

Japp said:

'The answer to that is—almost anybody! His sister could have come down from their flat above and shot him, one of the servants could have come in and shot him. His partner, Reilly, could have shot him. The boy Alfred could have shot him. One of the patients could have shot him.' He paused and said, 'And Amberiotis could have shot him—easiest of the lot.'

Poirot nodded.

'But in that case—we have to find out why.'

'Exactly. You've come round again to the original problem. Why? Amberiotis is staying at the Savoy. Why does a rich Greek want to come and shoot an inoffensive dentist?'

'That's really going to be our stumbling block. Motive!'

Poirot shrugged his shoulders. He said:

'It would seem that death selected, most inartistically, the wrong man. The Mysterious Greek, the Rich Banker, the Famous Detective—how natural that one of them should be shot! For mysterious foreigners may be mixed up in espionage and rich bankers have connections who will benefit by their deaths and famous detectives may be dangerous to criminals.'

'Whereas poor old Morley wasn't dangerous to anybody,' observed Japp gloomily.

'I wonder.'

Japp whirled round on him.

'What's up your sleeve now?'

'Nothing. A chance remark.'

He repeated to Japp those few casual words of Mr Morley's about recognizing faces, and his mention of a patient.

Japp looked doubtful.

'It's possible, I suppose. But it's a bit far-fetched. It might have been someone who wanted their identity kept dark. You didn't notice any of the other patients this morning?'

Poirot murmured:

'I noticed in the waiting-room a young man who looked exactly like a murderer!'

Japp said, startled: 'What's that?'

Poirot smiled:

'Mon cher, it was upon my arrival here! I was nervous, fanciful—enfin, in a mood. Everything seemed sinister to me, the waiting-room, the patients, the very carpet on the stairs! Actually, I think the young man had very bad toothache. That was all!'

‘I know what it can be,’ said Japp. ‘However, we’ll check up on your murderer all the same. We’ll check up on everybody, whether it’s suicide or not. I think the first thing is to have another talk with Miss Morley. I’ve only had a word or two. It was a shock to her, of course, but she’s the kind that doesn’t break down. We’ll go and see her now.’

III

Tall and grim, Georgina Morley listened to what the two men had said and answered their questions. She said with emphasis:

‘It’s incredible to me—quite incredible—that my brother should have committed suicide!’

Poirot said:

‘You realize the alternative, Mademoiselle?’

‘You mean—murder.’ She paused. Then she said slowly: ‘It is true—that alternative seems nearly as impossible as the other.’

‘But not quite as impossible?’

‘No—because—oh, in the first case, you see, I am speaking of something I know—that is: my brother’s state of mind. I know he had nothing on his mind—I know that there was no reason—no reason at all why he should take his own life!’

‘You saw him this morning—before he started work?’

‘At breakfast—yes.’

‘And he was quite as usual—not upset in any way?’

‘He was upset—but not in the way you mean. He was just annoyed!’

‘Why was that?’

‘He had a busy morning in front of him, and his secretary and assistant had been called away.’

‘That is Miss Nevill?’

‘Yes.’

‘What used she to do for him?’

‘She did all his correspondence, of course, and kept the appointment book, and filed all the charts. She also saw to the sterilizing of the instruments and ground up his fillings and handed them to him when he was working.’

‘Had she been with him long?’

‘Three years. She is a very reliable girl and we are—were both very fond of her.’

Poirot said:

‘She was called away owing to the illness of a relative, so your brother told me.’

‘Yes, she got a telegram to say her aunt had had a stroke. She went off to Somerset by an early train.’

‘And that was what annoyed your brother so much?’

‘Ye-es.’ There was a faint hesitation in Miss Morley’s answer. She went on rather hurriedly. ‘You—you mustn’t think my brother unfeeling. It was only that he thought—just for a moment—’

‘Yes, Miss Morley?’

‘Well, that she might have played truant on purpose. Oh! Please don’t misunderstand me—I’m quite certain that Gladys would never do such a thing. I told Henry so. But the fact of the matter is, that she has got herself engaged to rather an unsuitable young man—Henry was very vexed about it—and it occurred to him that this young man might have persuaded her to take a day off.’

‘Was that likely?’

‘No, I’m sure it wasn’t. Gladys is a very conscientious girl.’

‘But it is the sort of thing the young man might have suggested?’

Miss Morley sniffed.

‘Quite likely, I should say.’

‘What does he do, this young fellow—what is his name, by the way?’

‘Carter, Frank Carter. He is—or was—an insurance clerk, I believe. He lost his job some weeks ago and doesn’t seem able to get another. Henry said—and I dare say he was right—that he is a complete rotter. Gladys had actually lent him some of her savings and Henry was very annoyed about it.’

Japp said sharply:

‘Did your brother try to persuade her to break her engagement?’

‘Yes, he did, I know.’

‘Then this Frank Carter would, quite possibly, have a grudge against your brother.’

The Grenadier said robustly:

‘Nonsense—that is if you are suggesting that Frank Carter shot Henry. Henry advised the girl against young Carter, certainly; but she didn’t take his advice—she is foolishly devoted to Frank.’

‘Is there anyone else you can think of who had a grudge against your brother?’

Miss Morley shook her head.

‘Did he get on well with his partner, Mr Reilly?’

Miss Morley replied acidly:

‘As well as you can ever hope to get on with an Irishman!’

‘What do you mean by that, Miss Morley?’

‘Well, Irishmen have hot tempers and they thoroughly enjoy a row of any kind. Mr Reilly liked arguing about politics.’

‘That was all?’

‘That was all. Mr Reilly is unsatisfactory in many ways, but he was very skilled in his profession—or so my brother said.’

Japp persisted:

'How is he unsatisfactory?'

Miss Morley hesitated, then said acidly:

'He drinks too much—but please don't let that go any further.'

'Was there any trouble between him and your brother on that subject?'

'Henry gave him one or two hints. In dentistry,' continued Miss Morley didactically, 'a steady hand is needed, and an alcoholic breath doesnot inspire confidence.'

Japp bowed his head in agreement. Then he said:

'Can you tell us anything of your brother's financial position?'

'Henry was making a good income and he had a certain amount put by. We each had a small private income of our own left to us by our father.'

Japp murmured with a slight cough:

'You don't know, I suppose, if your brother left a will?'

'He did—and I can tell you its contents. He left a hundred pounds to Gladys Nevill, otherwise everything comes to me.'

'I see. Now—'

There was a fierce thump on the door. Alfred's face then appeared round it. His goggling eyes took in each detail of the two visitors as he ejaculated:

'It's Miss Nevill. She's back—and in a rare taking. Shall she come in, she wants to know?'

Japp nodded and Miss Morley said:

'Tell her to come here, Alfred.'

'O.K.,' said Alfred, and disappeared. Miss Morley said with a sigh and in obvious capital letters:

'That Boy is a Sad Trial.'

IV

Gladys Nevill was a tall, fair, somewhat anaemic girl of about twenty-eight. Though obviously very upset, she at once showed that she was capable and intelligent.

Under the pretext of looking through Mr Morley's papers, Japp got her away from Miss Morley down to the little office next door to the surgery.

She repeated more than once:

'I simply cannot believe it! It seems quite incredible that Mr Morley should do such a thing!'

She was emphatic that he had not seemed troubled or worried in any way. Then Japp began:

'You were called away today, Miss Nevill—'

She interrupted him.

'Yes, and the whole thing was a wicked practical joke! I do think it's awful of people to do things like that. I really do.'

'What do you mean, Miss Nevill?'

'Why, there wasn't anything the matter with Aunt at all. She'd never been better. She couldn't understand it when I suddenly turned up. Of course I was ever so glad—but it did make me mad. Sending a telegram like that and upsetting me and everything.'

'Have you got that telegram, Miss Nevill?'

'I threw it away, I think, at the station. It just said, Your aunt had a stroke last night. Please come at once

.'

'You are quite sure—well—' Japp coughed delicately—'that it wasn't your friend, Mr Carter, who sent that telegram?'

'Frank? Whatever for? Oh! I see, you mean—a put-up job between us? No, indeed, Inspector—neither of us would do such a thing.'

Her indignation seemed genuine enough and Japp had a little trouble in soothing her down. But a question as to the patients on this particular morning restored her to her competent self.

'They are all here in the book. I dare say you have seen it already. I know about most of them. Ten o'clock, Mrs Soames—that was about her new plate. Ten-thirty, Lady Grant—she's an elderly lady—lives in Lowndes Square. Eleven o'clock, M. Hercule Poirot, he comes regularly—oh, of course this is him—sorry, M. Poirot, but I really am so upset! Eleven-thirty, Mr Alistair Blunt—that's the banker, you know—a short appointment, because Mr Morley had prepared the filling last time. Then Miss Sainsbury Seale—she rang up specially—had toothache and so Mr Morley fitted her in. A terrible talker, she is, never stops—the fussy kind, too. Then twelve o'clock, Mr Amberiotis—he was a new patient—made an appointment from the Savoy Hotel. Mr Morley gets quite a lot of foreigners and Americans. Then twelve-thirty, Miss Kirby. She comes up from Worthing.'

Poirot asked:

'There was here when I arrived a tall military gentleman. Who would he be?'

'One of Mr Reilly's patients, I expect. I'll just get his list for you, shall I?'

'Thank you, Miss Nevill.'

She was absent only a few minutes. She returned with a similar book to that of Mr Morley. She read out:

'Ten o'clock, Betty Heath (that's a little girl of nine). Eleven o'clock, Colonel Abercrombie.'

'Abercrombie!' murmured Poirot. 'C'était ça!'

'Eleven-thirty, Mr Howard Raikes. Twelve o'clock, Mr Barnes. That was all the patients this morning. Mr Reilly isn't so booked up as Mr Morley, of course.'

'Can you tell us anything about any of these patients of Mr Reilly's?'

'Colonel Abercrombie has been a patient for a long time, and all Mrs Heath's children come to Mr Reilly. I can't tell you anything about Mr Raikes or Mr Barnes, though I fancy I have heard their names. I take all the telephone calls, you see—'

Japp said:

'We can ask Mr Reilly ourselves. I should like to see him as soon as possible.'

Miss Nevill went out. Japp said to Poirot:

‘All old patients of Mr Morley’s except Amberiotis . I’m going to have an interesting talk with Mr Amberiotis presently. He’s the last person, as it stands, to see Morley alive, and we’ve got to make quite sure that when he last saw him, Morley was alive.’

Poirot said slowly, shaking his head:

‘You have still to prove motive.’

‘I know. That’s what is going to be the teaser. But we may have something about Amberiotis at the Yard.’ He added sharply: ‘You’re very thoughtful, Poirot!’

‘I was wondering about something.’

‘What was it?’

Poirot said with a faint smile:

‘Why Chief Inspector Japp?’

‘Eh?’

‘I said, “Why Chief Inspector Japp?” An officer of your eminence—is he usually called in to a case of suicide?’

‘As a matter of fact, I happened to be nearby at the time. At Lavenham’s—in Wigmore Street. Rather an ingenious system of frauds they’ve had there. They telephoned me there to come on here.’

‘But why did they telephone you?’

‘Oh, that—that’s simple enough. Alistair Blunt. As soon as the Divisional Inspector heard he’d been here this morning, he got on to the Yard. Mr Blunt is the kind of person we take care of in this country.’

‘You mean that there are people who would like him—out of the way?’

‘You bet there are. The Reds, to begin with—and our Blackshirted friends, too. It’s Blunt and his group who are standing solid behind the present Government. Good sound Conservative finance. That’s why, if there were the least chance that there was any funny stuff intended against him this morning, they wanted a thorough investigation.’

Poirot nodded.

‘That is what I more or less guessed. And that is the feeling I have’—he waved his hands expressively—‘that there was, perhaps—a hitch of some kind. The proper victim was—should have been—Alistair Blunt. Or is this only a beginning—the beginning of a campaign of some kind? I smell—I smell—’ he sniffed the air, ‘—big money in this business!’

Japp said:

‘You’re assuming a lot, you know.’

‘I am suggesting that ce pauvre Morley was only a pawn in the game. Perhaps he knew something—perhaps he told Blunt something—or they feared he would tell Blunt something—’

He stopped as Gladys Nevill entered the room.

‘Mr Reilly is busy on an extraction case,’ she said. ‘He will be free in about ten minutes if that will be all right?’

Japp said that it would. In the meantime, he said, he would have another talk to the boy Alfred. V

Alfred was divided between nervousness, enjoyment, and a morbid fear of being blamed for everything that had occurred! He had only been a fortnight in Mr Morley's employment, and during that fortnight he had consistently and unvaryingly done everything wrong. Persistent blame had sapped his self-confidence.

'He was a bit rattier than usual, perhaps,' said Alfred in answer to a question, 'nothing else as I can remember. I'd never have thought he was going to do himself in.'

Poirot interposed.

'You must tell us,' he said, 'everything that you can remember about this morning. You are a very important witness, and your recollections may be of immense service to us.'

Alfred's face was suffused by vivid crimson and his chest swelled. He had already given Japp a brief account of the morning's happenings. He proposed now to spread himself. A comforting sense of importance oozed into him.

'I can tell you orl right,' he said. 'Just you ask me.'

'To begin with, did anything out of the way happen this morning?'

Alfred reflected a minute and then said rather sadly: 'Can't say as it did. It was orl just as usual.'

'Did any strangers come to the house?'

'No, sir.'

'Not even among the patients?'

'I didn't know as you meant the patients. Nobody come what hadn't got an appointment, if that's what you mean. They were all down in the book.'

Japp nodded. Poirot asked:

'Could anybody have walked in from outside?'

'No, they couldn't. They'd have to have a key, see?'

'But it was quite easy to leave the house?'

'Oh, yes, just turn the handle and go out and pull the door to after you. As I was saying most of 'em do. They often come down the stairs while I'm taking up the next party in the lift, see?'

'I see. Now just tell us who came first this morning and so on. Describe them if you can't remember their names.'

Alfred reflected a minute. Then he said: 'Lady with a little girl, that was for Mr Reilly and a Mrs Soap or some such name for Mr Morley.'

Poirot said:

'Quite right. Go on.'

'Then another elderly lady—bit of a toff she was—come in a Daimler. As she went out a tall military gent come in, and just after him, you came,' he nodded to Poirot.

'Right.'

'Then the American gent came—'

Japp said sharply:

‘American?’

‘Yes, sir. Young fellow. He was American all right—you could tell by his voice. Come early, he did. His appointment wasn’t till eleven-thirty—and what’s more he didn’t keep it—neither.’

Japp said sharply:

‘What’s that?’

‘Not him. Come in for him when Mr Reilly’s buzzer went at eleven-thirty—a bit later it was, as a matter of fact, might have been twenty to twelve—and he wasn’t there. Must have funked it and gone away.’

He added with a knowledgeable air, ‘They do sometimes.’

Poirot said:

‘Then he must have gone out soon after me?’

‘That’s right, sir. You went out after I’d taken up a toff what come in a Rolls. Coo—it was a lovely car, Mr Blunt—eleven-thirty. Then I come down and let you out, and a lady in. Miss Some Berry Seal, or something like that—and then I—well, as a matter of fact I just nipped down to the kitchen to get my elevenses, and when I was down there the buzzer went—Mr Reilly’s buzzer—so I come up and, as I say, the American gentleman had hooked it. I went and told Mr Reilly and he swore a bit, as is his way.’

Poirot said:

‘Continue.’

‘Lemme see, what happened next? Oh, yes, Mr Morley’s buzzer went for that Miss Seal, and the toff came down and went out as I took Miss Whatsername up in the lift. Then I come down again and two gentlemen came—one a little man with a funny squeaky voice—I can’t remember his name. For Mr Reilly, he was. And a fat foreign gentleman for Mr Morley.

‘Miss Seal wasn’t very long—not above a quarter of an hour. I let her out and then I took up the foreign gentleman. I’d already taken the other gent into Mr Reilly right away as soon as he came.’

Japp said:

‘And you didn’t see Mr Amberiotis, the foreign gentleman, leave?’

‘No, sir, I can’t say as I did. He must have let himself out. I didn’t see either of those two gentlemen go.’

‘Where were you from twelve o’clock onwards?’

‘I always sit in the lift, sir, waiting until the front-door bell or one of the buzzers goes.’

Poirot said:

‘And you were perhaps reading?’

Alfred blushed again.

‘There ain’t no harm in that, sir. It’s not as though I could be doing anything else.’

‘Quite so. What were you reading?’

‘Death at Eleven-Forty-Five, sir. It’s an American detective story. It’s a corker, sir, it really is! All about gunmen.’

Poirot smiled faintly. He said:

‘Would you hear the front door close from where you were?’

‘You mean anyone going out? I don’t think I should, sir. What I mean is, I shouldn’t notice it! You see, the lift is right at the back of the hall and a little round the corner. The bell rings just behind it, and the buzzers too. You can’t miss them.’

Poirot nodded and Japp asked:

‘What happened next?’

Alfred frowned in a supreme effort of memory.

‘Only the last lady, Miss Shirty. I waited for Mr Morley’s buzzer to go, but nothing happened and at one o’clock the lady who was waiting, she got rather ratty.’

‘It did not occur to you to go up before and see if Mr Morley was ready?’

Alfred shook his head very positively.

‘Not me, sir. I wouldn’t have dreamed of it. For all I knew the last gentleman was still up there. I’d got to wait for the buzzer. Of course if I’d knowed as Mr Morley had done himself in—’

Alfred shook his head with morbid relish.

Poirot asked:

‘Did the buzzer usually go before the patient came down, or the other way about?’

‘Depends. Usually the patient would come down the stairs and then the buzzer would go. If they rang for the lift, that buzzer would go perhaps as I was bringing them down. But it wasn’t fixed in any way. Sometimes Mr Morley would be a few minutes before he rang for the next patient. If he was in a hurry, he’d ring as soon as they were out of the room.’

‘I see—’ Poirot paused and then went on:

‘Were you surprised at Mr Morley’s suicide, Alfred?’

‘Knocked all of a heap, I was. He hadn’t no call to go doing himself in as far as I can see—oh!’ Alfred’s eyes grew large and round. ‘Oo—er—he wasn’t murdered, was he?’

Poirot cut in before Japp could speak.

‘Supposing he were, would it surprise you less?’

‘Well, I don’t know, sir, I’m sure. I can’t see who’d want to murder Mr Morley. He was—well, he was a very ordinary gentleman, sir. Was hereally murdered, sir?’

Poirot said gravely:

‘We have to take every possibility into account. That is why I told you you would be a very important witness and that you must try and recollect everything that happened this morning.’

He stressed the words and Alfred frowned with a prodigious effort of memory.

‘I can’t think of anything else, sir. I can’t indeed.’

Alfred’s tone was rueful.

‘Very good, Alfred. And you are quite sure no one except patients came to the house this morning?’

‘Nostranger did, sir. That Miss Nevill’s young man came round—and in a rare taking not to find her here.’

Japp said sharply:

‘When was that?’

‘Some time after twelve it was. When I told him Miss Nevill was away for the day, he seemed very put out and he said he’d wait and see Mr Morley. I told him Mr Morley was busy right up to lunch time, but he said: Never mind, he’d wait.’

Poirot asked:

‘And did he wait?’

A startled look came into Alfred’s eyes. He said:

‘Cor—I never thought of that! He went into the waiting-room, but he wasn’t there later. He must have got tired of waiting, and thought he’d come back another time.’

VI

When Alfred had gone out of the room, Japp said sharply:

‘D’you think it wise to suggest murder to that lad?’

Poirot shrugged his shoulders.

‘I think so—yes. Anything suggestive that he may have seen or heard will come back to him under the stimulus, and he will be keenly alert to everything that goes on here.’

‘All the same, we don’t want it to get about too soon.’

‘Mon cher, it will not. Alfred reads detective stories—Alfred is enamoured of crime. Whatever Alfred lets slip will be put down to Alfred’s morbid criminal imagination.’

‘Well, perhaps you are right, Poirot. Now we’ve got to hear what Reilly has to say.’

Mr Reilly’s surgery and office were on the first floor. They were as spacious as the ones above but had less light in them, and were not quite so richly appointed.

Mr Morley’s partner was a tall, dark young man, with a plume of hair that fell untidily over his forehead. He had an attractive voice and a very shrewd eye.

‘We’re hoping, Mr Reilly,’ said Japp, after introducing himself, ‘that you can throw some light on this matter.’

‘You’re wrong then, because I can’t,’ replied the other. ‘I’d say this—that Henry Morley was the last person to go taking his own life. I might have done it—but he wouldn’t.’

‘Why might you have done it?’ asked Poirot.

‘Because I’ve oceans of worries,’ replied the other. ‘Money troubles, for one! I’ve never yet been able to suit my expenditure to my income. But Morley was a careful man. You’ll find no debts, nor money troubles, I’m sure of that.’

‘Love affairs?’ suggested Japp.

‘Is it Morley you mean? He had no joy of living at all! Right under his sister’s thumb he was, poor man.’

Japp went on to ask Reilly details about the patients he had seen that morning.

‘Oh, I fancy they’re all square and above-board. Little Betty Heath, she’s a nice child—I’ve had the whole family one after another. Colonel Abercrombie’s an old patient, too.’

‘What about Mr Howard Raikes?’ asked Japp.

Reilly grinned broadly.

‘The one who walked out on me? He’s never been to me before. I know nothing about him. He rang up and particularly asked for an appointment this morning.’

‘Where did he ring up from?’

‘Holborn Palace Hotel. He’s an American, I fancy.’

‘So Alfred said.’

‘Alfred should know,’ said Mr Reilly. ‘He’s a film fan, our Alfred.’

‘And your other patient?’

‘Barnes? A funny precise little man. Retired Civil Servant. Lives out Ealing way.’

Japp paused a minute and then said:

‘What can you tell us about Miss Nevill?’

Mr Reilly raised his eyebrows.

‘The bee-yewtiful blonde secretary? Nothing doing, old boy! Her relations with old Morley were perfectly power—I’m sure of it.’

‘I never suggested they weren’t,’ said Japp, reddening slightly.

‘My fault,’ said Reilly. ‘Excuse my filthy mind, won’t you? I thought it might be an attempt on your part tocherchez la femme .’

‘Excuse me for speaking your language,’ he added parenthetically to Poirot. ‘Beautiful accent, haven’t I?’

‘It comes of being educated by nuns.’

Japp disapproved of this flippancy. He asked:

‘Do you know anything about the young man she is engaged to? His name is Carter, I understand. Frank Carter.’

‘Morley didn’t think much of him,’ said Reilly. ‘He tried to get la Nevill to turn him down.’

‘That might have annoyed Carter?’

‘Probably annoyed him frightfully,’ agreed Mr Reilly cheerfully. He paused and then added:

‘Excuse me, this is a suicide you are investigating, not a murder?’

Japp said sharply:

‘If it were a murder, would you have anything to suggest?’

‘Not I! I’d like it to be Georgina! One of those grim females with temperance on the brain. But I’m afraid Georgina is full of moral rectitude. Of course I could easily have nipped upstairs and shot the old boy myself, but I didn’t. In fact, I can’t imagine anyone wanting to kill Morley. But then I can’t conceive of his killing himself.’

He added—in a different voice:

‘As a matter of fact, I’m very sorry about it... You mustn’t judge by my manner. That’s just nervousness, you know. I was fond of old Morley and I shall miss him.’

VII

Japp put down the telephone receiver. His face, as he turned to Poirot, was rather grim. He said:

‘Mr Amberiotis isn’t feeling very well—would rather not see any one this afternoon.

‘He’s going to see me—and he’s not going to give me the slip either! I’ve got a man at the Savoy ready to trail him if he tries to make a get-away.’

Poirot said thoughtfully:

‘You think Amberiotis shot Morley?’

‘I don’t know. But he was the last person to see Morley alive. And he was a new patient. According to his story, he left Morley alive and well at twenty-five minutes past twelve. That may be true or it may not. If Morley was all right then we’ve got to reconstruct what happened next. There was still five minutes to go before his next appointment. Did someone come in and see him during that five minutes? Carter, say?

Or Reilly? What happened? Depend upon it, by half-past twelve, or five-and-twenty to one at the latest, Morley was dead—otherwise he’d either have sounded his buzzer or else sent down word to Miss Kirby that he couldn’t see her. No, either he was killed, or else somebody told him something which upset the whole tenor of his mind, and he took his own life.’

He paused.

‘I’m going to have a word with every patient he saw this morning. There’s just the possibility that he may have said something to one of them that will put us on the right track.’

He glanced at his watch.

‘Mr Alistair Blunt said he could give me a few minutes at four-fifteen. We’ll go to him first. His house is on Chelsea Embankment. Then we might take the Sainsbury Seale woman on our way to Amberiotis. I’d prefer to know all we can before tackling our Greek friend. After that, I’d like a word or two with the American who, according to you “looked like murder”.’

Hercule Poirot shook his head.

‘Not murder—toothache.’

‘All the same, we’ll see this Mr Raikes. His conduct was queer to say the least of it. And we’ll check up on Miss Nevill’s telegram and on her aunt and on her young man. In fact, we’ll check up on everything and everybody!’

VIII

Alistair Blunt had never loomed large in the public eye. Possibly because he was himself a very quiet and retiring man. Possibly because for many years he had functioned as a Prince Consort rather than as a King.

Rebecca Sanseverato, née Arnholt, came to London a disillusioned woman of forty-five. On either side she came of the Royalty of wealth. Her mother was an heiress of the European family of Rothersteins. Her father was the head of the great American banking house of Arnholt. Rebecca Arnholt, owing to the calamitous deaths of two brothers and a cousin in an air accident, was sole heiress to immense wealth. She married a European aristocrat with a famous name, Prince Felipe di Sanseverato. Three years later she obtained a divorce and custody of the child of the marriage, having spent two years of wretchedness with a well-bred scoundrel whose conduct was notorious. A few years later her child died. Embittered by her sufferings, Rebecca Arnholt turned her undoubted brains to the business of finance—the aptitude for it ran in her blood. She associated herself with her father in banking. After his death she continued to be a powerful figure in the financial world with her immense holdings. She came to London—and a junior partner of the London house was sent to Claridge’s to see her with various documents. Six months later the world was electrified to hear that Rebecca Sanseverato was marrying Alistair Blunt, a man nearly twenty years younger than herself. There were the usual jeers—and smiles. Rebecca, her friends said, was really an incurable fool where men were concerned! First Sanseverato—now this young man. Of course he was only marrying her for her money. She was in for a second disaster! But to everyone’s surprise the marriage was a success. The people who prophesied that Alistair Blunt would spend her money on other women were wrong. He remained quietly devoted to his wife. Even after her death, ten years later, when as inheritor of her vast wealth he might have been supposed to cut loose, he did not marry again. He lived the same quiet and simple life. His genius for finance had been no less than his wife’s. His judgements and dealings were sound—his integrity above question. He dominated the vast Arnholt and Rotherstein interests by his sheer ability.

He went very little into society, had a house in Kent and one in Norfolk where he spent week-ends—not with gay parties, but with a few quiet stodgy friends. He was fond of golf and played moderately well. He was interested in his garden.

This was the man towards whom Chief Inspector Japp and Hercule Poirot were bouncing along in a somewhat elderly taxi.

The Gothic House was a well-known feature on Chelsea Embankment. Inside it was luxurious with an expensive simplicity. It was not very modern but it was eminently comfortable. Alistair Blunt did not keep them waiting. He came to them almost at once.

‘Chief Inspector Japp?’

Japp came forward and introduced Hercule Poirot. Blunt looked at him with interest.

‘I know your name, of course, M. Poirot. And surely—somewhere—quite recently—’ he paused, frowning.

Poirot said:

‘This morning, Monsieur, in the waiting-room ofce pauvre M. Morley .’

Alistair Blunt’s brow cleared. He said:

‘Of course. I knew I had seen you somewhere.’ He turned to Japp. ‘What can I do for you? I am extremely sorry to hear about poor Morley.’

‘You were surprised, Mr Blunt?’

‘Very surprised. Of course I knew very little about him, but I should have thought him a most unlikely person to commit suicide.’

‘He seemed in good health and spirits then, this morning?’

‘I think so—yes.’ Alistair Blunt paused, then said with an almost boyish smile: ‘To tell you the truth, I’m a most awful coward about going to the dentist. And I simply hate that beastly drill thing they run into you. That’s why I really didn’t notice anything much. Not till it was over, you know, and I got up to go. But I must say Morley seemed perfectly natural then. Cheerful and busy.’

‘You have been to him often?’

‘I think this was my third or fourth visit. I’ve never had much trouble with my teeth until the last year. Breaking up, I suppose.’

Hercule Poirot asked:

‘Who recommended Mr Morley to you originally?’

Blunt drew his brows together in an effort of concentration.

‘Let me see now—I had a twinge—somebody told me Morley of Queen Charlotte Street was the man to go to—no, I can’t for the life of me remember who it was. Sorry.’

Poirot said:

‘If it should come back to you, perhaps you will let one of us know?’

Alistair Blunt looked at him curiously.

He said:

‘I will—certainly. Why? Does it matter?’

‘I have an idea,’ said Poirot, ‘that it might matter very much.’

They were going down the steps of the house when a car drew up in front of it. It was a car of sporting build—one of those cars from which it is necessary to wriggle from under the wheel in sections. The young woman who did so appeared to consist chiefly of arms and legs. She had finally dislodged herself as the men turned to walk down the street.

The girl stood on the pavement looking after them. Then, suddenly and vigorously, she ejaculated, ‘Hi!’

Not realizing that the call was addressed to them, neither man turned, and the girl repeated: ‘Hi! Hi! You there!’

They stopped and looked round inquiringly. The girl walked towards them. The impression of arms and legs remained. She was tall, thin, and her face had an intelligence and aliveness that redeemed its lack of actual beauty. She was dark with a deeply tanned skin.

She was addressing Poirot:

‘I know who you are—you’re the detective man, Hercule Poirot!’ Her voice was warm and deep, with a trace of American accent.

Poirot said:

‘At your service, Mademoiselle.’

Her eyes went on to his companion.

Poirot said:

‘Chief Inspector Japp.’

Her eyes widened—almost it seemed with alarm. She said, and there was a slight breathlessness in her voice:

‘What have you been doing here? Nothing—nothing has happened to Uncle Alistair, has it?’

Poirot said quickly:

‘Why should you think so, Mademoiselle?’

‘It hasn’t? Good.’

Japp took up Poirot’s question.

‘Why should you think anything had happened to Mr Blunt, Miss—’

He paused inquiringly.

The girl said mechanically:

‘Olivera. Jane Olivera.’ Then she gave a slight and rather unconvincing laugh. ‘Sleuths on the doorstep rather suggest bombs in the attic, don’t they?’

‘There’s nothing wrong with Mr Blunt, I’m thankful to say, Miss Olivera.’

She looked directly at Poirot.

‘Did he call you in about something?’

Japp said:

‘We called on him, Miss Olivera, to see if he could throw any light on a case of suicide that occurred this morning.’

She said sharply:

‘Suicide? Whose? Where?’

‘A Mr Morley, a dentist, of 58, Queen Charlotte Street.’

‘Oh!’ said Jane Olivera blankly. ‘Oh!—’ She started ahead of her, frowning. Then she said unexpectedly:

‘Oh, but that’s absurd!’ And turning on her heel she left them abruptly and without ceremony, running up the steps of the Gothic House and letting herself in with a key.

‘Well!’ said Japp, staring after her, ‘that’s an extraordinary thing to say.’

‘Interesting,’ observed Poirot mildly.

Japp pulled himself together, glanced at his watch and hailed an approaching taxi.

‘We’ll have time to take the Sainsbury Seale on our way to the Savoy.’

IX

Miss Sainsbury Seale was in the dimly lit lounge of the Glengowrie Court Hotel having tea. She was flustered by the appearance of a police officer in plain clothes—but her excitement was of a pleasurable nature, he observed. Poirot noticed, with sorrow, that she had not yet sewn the buckle on her shoe.

‘Really, officer,’ fluted Miss Sainsbury Seale, glancing round, ‘I really don’t know where we could go to be private. So difficult—just tea-time—but perhaps you would care for some tea—and—and your friend—’

‘Not for me, Madam,’ said Japp. ‘This is M. Hercule Poirot.’

‘Really?’ said Miss Sainsbury Seale. ‘Then perhaps—you’re sure—you won’t either of you have tea?’

No. Well, perhaps we might try the drawing-room, though that’s very often full—Oh, I see, there is a corner over there—in the recess. The people are just leaving. Shall we go there—’

She led the way to the comparative seclusion of a sofa and two chairs in an alcove. Poirot and Japp followed her, the former picking up a scarf and a handkerchief that Miss Sainsbury Seale had shed en route.

He restored them to her.

'Oh, thank you—so careless of me. Now please, Inspector—No, Chief Inspector, isn't it?—do ask me anything you like. So distressing, the whole business. Poor man—I suppose he had something on his mind? Such worrying times we live in!'

'Did he seem to you worried, Miss Sainsbury Seale?'

'Well—' Miss Sainsbury Seale reflected, and finally said unwillingly:

'I can't really say, you know, that he did! But then perhaps I shouldn't notice—not under the circumstances. I'm afraid I'm rather awkward, you know.' Miss Sainsbury Seale tittered a little and patted her bird's-nest-like curls.

'Can you tell us who else was in the waiting-room while you were there?'

'Now let me see—there was just one young man there when I went in. I think he was in pain because he was muttering to himself and looking quite wild and turning over the leaves of a magazine just anyhow. And then suddenly he jumped up and went out. Really a acute toothache he must have had.'

'You don't know whether he left the house when he went out of the room?'

'I don't know at all. I imagined he just felt he couldn't wait any longer and must see the dentist. But it couldn't have been Mr Morley he was going to, because the boy came in and took me up to Mr Morley only a few minutes later.'

'Did you go into the waiting-room again on your way out?'

'No. Because, you see, I'd already put on my hat and straightened my hair up in Mr Morley's room. Some people,' went on Miss Sainsbury Seale, warming to her subject, 'take off their hats downstairs in the waiting-room, but I never do. A most distressing thing happened to a friend of mine who did that. It was a new hat and she put it very carefully on a chair, and when she came down, would you believe it, a child had sat on it and squashed it flat. Ruined! Absolutely ruined!'

'A catastrophe,' said Poirot politely.

'I blame the mother entirely,' said Miss Sainsbury Seale judicially. 'Mothers should keep an eye on their children. The little dears do not mean any harm, but they have to be watched.'

Japp said:

'Then this young man with toothache was the only other patient you noticed at 58, Queen Charlotte Street.'

'A gentleman came down the stairs and went out just as I went up to Mr Morley—Oh! and I remember—a very peculiar looking foreigner came out of the house just as I arrived.'

Japp coughed. Poirot said with dignity:

'That was I, Madame.'

'Oh dear!' Miss Sainsbury Seale peered at him. 'So it was! Do forgive—so short-sighted—and very dark here, isn't it?' She tailed off into incoherencies. 'And really, you know, I flatter myself that I have a very good memory for faces. But the light here is dim, isn't it? Do forgive my most unfortunate mistake!'

They soothed the lady down, and Japp asked:

'You are quite sure Mr Morley didn't say anything such as—for instance—that he was expecting a painful interview this morning? Anything of that kind?'

'No, indeed, I'm sure he didn't.'

'He didn't mention a patient by the name of Amberiotis?'

‘No, no. He really said nothing—except, I mean, the things that dentists have to say.’

Through Poirot’s mind there ran quickly: ‘Rinse. Open a little wider, please. Now close gently.’

Japp had proceeded to his next step. It would possibly be necessary for Miss Sainsbury Seale to give evidence at the inquest.

After a first scream of dismay, Miss Sainsbury Seale seemed to take kindly to the idea. A tentative inquiry from Japp produced Miss Sainsbury Seale’s whole life history. She had, it seemed, come from India to England six months ago. She had lived in various hotels and boarding-houses and had finally come to the Glengowrie Court which she liked very much because of its homely atmosphere; in India she had lived mostly in Calcutta where she had done Mission work and had also taught elocution.

‘Pure, well-enunciated English—most important, Chief Inspector. You see,’ Miss Sainsbury Seale simpered and bridled, ‘as a girl I was on the stage. Oh! only in small parts, you know. The provinces!’

But I had great ambitions. Repertory. Then I went on a world tour—Shakespeare, Bernard Shaw.’ She sighed. ‘The trouble with us poor women is heart —at the mercy of our hearts . A rash impulsive marriage. Alas! we parted almost immediately. I—I had been sadly deceived. I resumed my maiden name. A friend kindly provided me with a little capital and I started my elocution school. I helped to found a very good amateur dramatic society. I must show you some of our notices.’

Chief Inspector Japp knew the dangers of that ! He escaped, Miss Sainsbury Seale’s last words being:

‘and if, by any chance, my name should be in the papers—as a witness at the inquest, I mean—you will be sure that it is spelt right. Mabelle Sainsbury Seale—Mabelle spelt M.A.B.E.L.L.E, and Seale S.E.A.L.E. And, of course, if they did care to mention that I appeared in As You Like It at the Oxford Repertory Theatre—’

‘Of course, of course.’ Chief Inspector Japp fairly fled.

In the taxi, he sighed and wiped his forehead.

‘If it’s ever necessary, we ought to be able to check up on her all right,’ he observed, ‘unless it was all lies—but that I don’t believe!’

Poirot shook his head. ‘Liars,’ he said, ‘are neither so circumstantial nor so inconsequential.’

Japp went on:

‘I was afraid she’d jibe at the inquest—most middle-aged spinsters do—but her having been an actress accounts for her being eager. Bit of limelight for her!’

Poirot said:

‘Do you really want her at the inquest?’

‘Probably not. It depends.’ He paused and then said: ‘I’m more than ever convinced, Poirot. This wasn’t suicide .’

‘And the motive?’

‘Has us beat for the moment. Suppose Morley once seduced Amberiotis’ daughter?’

Poirot was silent. He tried to visualize Mr Morley in the role of seducer to a luscious-eyed Greek maiden, but failed lamentably.

He reminded Japp that Mr Reilly had said his partner had had no joy of living. Japp said vaguely: ‘Oh well, you never know what may happen on a cruise!’ and he added with satisfaction, ‘We shall know better where we stand when we’ve talked to this fellow.’

They paid off the taxi and entered the Savoy.

Japp asked for Mr Amberiotis.

The clerk looked at them rather oddly. He said:

‘Mr Amberiotis? I’m sorry, sir, I’m afraid you can’t see him.’

‘Oh, yes, I can, my lad,’ Japp said grimly. He drew the other a little aside and showed him his credentials.

The clerk said:

‘You don’t understand, sir. Mr Amberiotis died half an hour ago.’

To Hercule Poirot it was as though a door had gently but firmly shut. Five, Six,

Picking up Sticks

I

Twenty-four hours later Japp rang Poirot up. His tone was bitter.

‘Wash-out! The whole thing!’

‘What do you mean, my friend?’

‘Morley committed suicide all right. We’ve got the motive.’

‘What was it?’

‘I’ve just had the doctor’s report on Amberiotis’ death. I won’t give you the official jargon but in plain English he died as a result of an overdose of adrenaline and novocaine. It acted on his heart, I understand, and he collapsed. When the wretched devil said he was feeling bad yesterday afternoon, he was just speaking the truth. Well, there you are! Adrenaline and procaine is the stuff dentists inject into your gum—local anaesthetic. Morley made an error, injected an overdose, and then after Amberiotis left, he realized what he had done, couldn’t face the music and shot himself.’

‘With a pistol he was not known to possess?’ queried Poirot.

‘Hemay have possessed it all the same. Relations don’t know everything. You’d be surprised sometimes, the things they don’t know!’

‘That is true, yes.’

Japp said:

‘Well, there you are. It’s a perfectly logical explanation of the whole thing.’

Poirot said:

‘You know, my friend, it does not quite satisfy me. It is true that patients have been known to react unfavourably to these local anaesthetics. Adrenaline idiosyncrasy is well known. In combination with procaine toxic effects have followed quite small doses. But the doctor or dentist who employed the drug does not usually carry his concern as far as killing himself!’

‘Yes, but you’re talking of cases where the employment of the anaesthetic was normal. In that case no particular blame attaches to the surgeon concerned. It is the idiosyncrasy of the patient that has caused death. But in this case it’s pretty clear that there was a definite overdose. They haven’t got the exact amount yet—these quantitative analyses seem to take a month of Sundays—but it was definitely more than the normal dose. That means that Morley must have made a mistake.'

'Even then,' said Poirot, 'it was a mistake. It would not be a criminal matter.'

'No, but it wouldn't do him any good in his profession. In fact, it would pretty well ruin him. Nobody's going to go to a dentist who's likely to shoot lethal doses of poison into you just because he happens to be a bit absent-minded.'

'It was a curious thing to do, I admit.'

'These things happen—they happen to doctors—they happen to chemists... Careful and reliable for years, and then—one moment's inattention—and the mischief's done and the poor devils are for it. Morley was a sensitive man. In the case of a doctor, there's usually a chemist or a dispenser to share the blame—or to shoulder it altogether. In this case Morley was solely responsible.'

Poirot demurred.

'Would he not have left some message behind him? Saying what he had done? And that he could not face the consequences? Something of that kind? Just a word for his sister?'

'No, as I see it, he suddenly realized what had happened—and just lost his nerve and took the quickest way out.'

Poirot did not answer.

Japp said:

'I know you, old boy. Once you've got your teeth into a case of murder, you like it to be a case of murder! I admit I'm responsible for setting you on the track this time. Well, I made a mistake. I admit it freely.'

Poirot said:

'I still think, you know, that there might be another explanation.'

'Plenty of other explanations, I dare say. I've thought of them—but they're all too fantastic. Let's say that Amberiotis shot Morley, went home, was filled with remorse and committed suicide, using some stuff he'd pinched from Morley's surgery. If you think that's likely, I think it's damned unlikely. We've got a record of Amberiotis at the Yard. Quite interesting. Started as a little hotel-keeper in Greece, then he mixed himself up in politics. He's done espionage work in Germany and in France—and made very pretty little sums of money. But he wasn't getting rich quick enough that way, and he's believed to have done a spot or two of blackmail. Not a nice man, our Mr Amberiotis. He was out in India last year and is believed to have bled one of the native princes rather freely. The difficult thing has been ever to prove anything against him. Slippery as an eel! There is another possibility. He might have been blackmailing Morley over something or other. Morley, having a golden opportunity, plugs an overdose of adrenaline and novocaine into him, hoping that the verdict will be an unfortunate accident—adrenaline idiosyncrasy—something of that sort. Then, after the man's gone away Morley gets a fit of remorse and does himself in. That's possible, of course, but I can't somehow see Morley as a deliberate murderer. No, I'm pretty sure it was what I first said—a genuine mistake, made on a morning when he was overworked. We'll have to leave it at that, Poirot. I've talked to the A.C. and he's quite clear on it.'

'I see,' said Poirot, with a sigh. 'I see...'

Japp said kindly:

'I know what you feel, old boy. But you can't have a nice juicy murder every time! So long. All I can say by way of apology is the old phrase: "Sorry you have been troubled!"'

He rang off.

II

Hercule Poirot sat at his handsome modern desk. He liked modern furniture. Its squareness and solidity were more agreeable to him than the soft contours of antique models. In front of him was a square sheet of paper with neat headings and comments. Against some of them were query marks.

First came:

Amberiotis. Espionage. In England for that purpose? Was in India last year. During period of riots and unrest. Could be a Communist agent.

There was a space, and then the next heading:

Frank Carter? Morley thought him unsatisfactory. Was discharged from his employment recently. Why?

After that came a name with merely a question mark:

Howard Raikes?

Next came a sentence in inverted commas.

‘But that’s absurd!’???

Hercule Poirot’s head was poised interrogatively. Outside the window a bird was carrying a twig to build its nest. Hercule Poirot looked rather like a bird as he sat there with his egg-shaped head cocked to one side.

He made another entry a little farther down:

Mr Barnes?

He paused and then wrote:

Morley’s office? Mark on carpet. Possibilities.

He considered that last entry for some time.

Then he got up, called for his hat and stick and went out.

III

Three-quarters of an hour later Hercule Poirot came out of the underground station at Ealing Broadway and five minutes after that he had reached his destination—No. 88, Castlegardens Road. It was a small semi-detached house, and the neatness of the front garden drew an admiring nod from Hercule Poirot.

‘Admirably symmetrical,’ he murmured to himself.

Mr Barnes was at home and Poirot was shown into a small, precise dining-room and here presently Mr Barnes came to him.

Mr Barnes was a small man with twinkling eyes and a nearly bald head. He peeped over the top of his glasses at his visitor while in his left hand he twirled the card that Poirot had given the maid. He said in a small, prim, almost falsetto voice:

‘Well, well, M. Poirot? I am honoured, I am sure.’

‘You must excuse my calling upon you in this informal manner,’ said Poirot punctiliously.

‘Much the best way,’ said Mr Barnes. ‘And the time is admirable, too. A quarter to seven—very sound time at this period of the year for catching anyone at home.’ He waved his hand. ‘Sit down, M. Poirot. I’ve no doubt we’ve got a good deal to talk about. 58, Queen Charlotte Street, I suppose?’

Poirot said:

‘You suppose rightly—but why should you suppose anything of the kind?’

‘My dear sir,’ said Mr Barnes, ‘I’ve been retired from the Home Office for sometime now—but I’ve not gone quite rusty yet. If there’s any hush-hush business, it’s far better not to use the police. Draws attention to it all!’

Poirot said:

‘I will ask yet another question. Why should you suppose this is a hush-hush business?’

‘Isn’t it?’ asked the other. ‘Well, if it isn’t, in my opinion it ought to be.’ He leant forward and tapped with his pince-nez on the arm of the chair. ‘In Secret Service work it’s never the little fry you want—it’s the big bugs at the top—but to get them you’ve got to be careful not to alarm the little fry.’

‘It seems to me, Mr Barnes, that you know more than I do,’ said Hercule Poirot.

‘Don’t know anything at all,’ replied the other, ‘just put two and two together.’

‘One of those two being?’

‘Amberiotis,’ said Mr Barnes promptly. ‘You forget I sat opposite him in the waiting-room for a minute or two. He didn’t know me. I was always an insignificant chap. Not a bad thing sometimes. But I knew him all right—and I could guess what he was up to over here.’

‘Which was?’

Mr Barnes twinkled more than ever.

‘We’re very tiresome people in this country. We’re conservative, you know, conservative to the backbone. We grumble a lot, but we don’t really want to smash our democratic government and try new-fangled experiments. That’s what’s so heart-breaking to the wretched foreign agitator who’s working full time and over! The whole trouble is—from their point of view—that we really are, as a country, comparatively solvent. Hardly any other country in Europe is at the moment! To upset England—really upset it—you’ve got to play hell with its finance—that’s what it comes to! And you can’t play hell with its finance when you’ve got men like Alistair Blunt at the helm.’

Mr Barnes paused and then went on:

‘Blunt is the kind of man who in private life would always pay his bills and live within his income—whether he’d got twopence a year or several million makes no difference. He is that type of fellow. And he just simply thinks that there’s no reason why a country shouldn’t be the same! No costly experiments. No frenzied expenditure on possible Utopias. That’s why’—he paused—‘that’s why certain people have made up their minds that Blunt must go.’

‘Ah,’ said Poirot.

Mr Barnes nodded.

‘Yes,’ he said. ‘I know what I’m talking about. Quite nice people some of ’em. Long-haired, earnest-eyed, and full of ideals of a better world. Others not so nice, rather nasty in fact. Furtive little rats with beards and foreign accents. And another lot again of the Big Bully type. But they’ve all got the same idea: Blunt Must Go!’

He tilted his chair gently back and forward again.

‘Sweep away the old order! The Tories, the Conservatives, the Diehards, the hard-headed suspicious Business Men, that’s the idea. Perhaps these people are right—Idon’t know—but I know one thing—you’ve got to have something to put in place of the old order—something that will work—not just something that sounds all right. Well, we needn’t go into that. We are dealing with concrete facts, not abstract theories. Take away the props and the building will come down. Blunt is one of the props of Things as They Are.'

He leaned forward.

'They're out after Blunt all right. That I know. And it's my opinion that yesterday morning they nearly got him. I may be wrong—but it's been tried before. The method, I mean.'

He paused and then quietly, circumspectly, he mentioned three names. An unusually able Chancellor of the Exchequer, a progressive and far-sighted manufacturer, and a hopeful young politician who had captured the public fancy. The first had died on the operating table, the second had succumbed to an obscure disease which had been recognized too late, the third had been run down by a car and killed.

'It's very easy,' said Mr Barnes. 'The anaesthetist muffed the giving of the anaesthetic—well, that does happen. In the second case the symptoms were puzzling. The doctor was just a well-meaning G.P., couldn't be expected to recognize them. In the third case, anxious mother was driving car in a hurry to get to her sick child. Sob stuff—the jury acquitted her of blame!'

He paused:

'All quite natural. And soon forgotten. But I'll just tell you where those three people are now. The anaesthetist is set up on his own with a first-class research laboratory—no expense spared. That G.P. has retired from practice. He's got a yacht, and a nice little place on the Broads. The mother is giving all her children a first-class education, ponies to ride in the holidays, nice house in the country with a big garden and paddocks.'

He nodded his head slowly.

'In every profession and walk of life there is someone who is vulnerable to temptation. The trouble in our case is that Morley wasn't!'

'You think it was like that?' said Hercule Poirot.

Mr Barnes said:

'I do. It's not easy to get at one of these big men, you know. They're fairly well protected. The car stunt is risky and doesn't always succeed. But a man is defenceless enough in a dentist's chair.'

He took off his pince-nez, polished them and put them on again. He said:

'That's my theory! Morley wouldn't do the job. He knew too much, though, so they had to put him out.'

'They?' asked Poirot.

'When I say they—I mean the organization that's behind all this. Only one person actually did the job, of course.'

'Which person?'

'Well, I could make a guess,' said Mr Barnes, 'but it's only a guess and I might be wrong.'

Poirot said quietly: 'Reilly?'

'Of course! He's the obvious person. I think that probably they never asked Morley to do the job himself. What he was to do, was to turn Blunt over to his partner at the last minute. Sudden illness, something of that sort. Reilly would have done the actual business—and there would have been another regrettable accident—death of a famous banker—unhappy young dentist in court in such a state of dither and misery that he would have been let down light. He'd have given up dentistry afterwards—and settled down somewhere on a nice income of several thousands a year.'

Mr Barnes looked across at Poirot.

‘Don’t think I’m romancing,’ he said. ‘These things happen.’

‘Yes, yes, I know they happen.’

Mr Barnes went on, tapping a book with a lurid jacket that lay on a table close at hand: ‘I read a lot of these spy yarns. Fantastic, some of them. But curiously enough they’re not any more fantastic than the real thing. There are beautiful adventuresses, and dark sinister men with foreign accents, and gangs and international associations and super crooks! I’d blush to see some of the things I know set down in print—nobody would believe them for a minute!’

Poirot said:

‘In your theory, where does Amberiotis come in?’

‘I’m not quite sure. I think he was meant to take the rap. He’s played a double game more than once and I dare say he was framed. That’s only an idea, mind.’

Hercule Poirot said quietly:

‘Granting that your ideas are correct—what will happen next?’

Mr Barnes rubbed his nose.

‘They’ll try to get him again,’ he said. ‘Oh, yes. They’ll have another try. Time’s short. Blunt has got people looking after him, I dare say. They’ll have to be extra careful. It won’t be a man hiding in a bush with a pistol. Nothing so crude as that. You tell ’em to look out for the respectable people—the relations, the old servants, the chemist’s assistant who makes up a medicine, the wine merchant who sells him his port. Getting Alistair Blunt out of the way is worth a great many millions, and it’s wonderful what people will do for—say a nice little income of four thousand a year!’

‘As much as that?’

‘Possibly more...’

Poirot was silent a moment, then he said:

‘I have had Reilly in mind from the first.’

‘Irish? I.R.A.?’

‘Not that so much, but there was a mark, you see, on the carpet, as though the body had been dragged along it. But if Morley had been shot by a patient he would be shot in the surgery and there would be no need to move the body. That is why, from the first, I suspected that he had been shot, not in the surgery, but in his office—next door. That would mean that it was not a patient who shot him, but some member of his own household.’

‘Neat,’ said Mr Barnes appreciatively.

Hercule Poirot got up and held out a hand.

‘Thank you,’ he said. ‘You have helped me a great deal.’

IV

On his way home, Poirot called in at the Glengowrie Court Hotel. As a result of that visit he rang Japp up very early the following morning.

‘Bonjour, mon ami. The inquest is today, is it not?’

‘It is. Are you going to attend?’

'I do not think so.'

'It won't really be worth your while, I expect.'

'Are you calling Miss Sainsbury Seale as a witness?'

'The lovely Mabelle—why can't she just spell it plain Mabel. These women get my goat! No, I'm not calling her. There's no need.'

'You have heard nothing from her?'

'No, why should I?'

Hercule Poirot said:

'I wondered, that was all. Perhaps it may interest you to learn that Miss Sainsbury Seale walked out of the Glangowrie Court Hotel just before dinner the night before last—and did not come back.'

'What? She's hooked it?'

'That is a possible explanation.'

'But why should she? She's quite all right, you know. Perfectly genuine and above-board. I cabled Calcutta about her—that was before I knew the reason for Amberiotis' death, otherwise I shouldn't have bothered—and I got the reply last night. Everything O.K. She's been known there for years, and her whole account of herself is true—except that she's slurred over her marriage a bit. Married a Hindu student and then found he'd got a few attachments already. So she resumed her maiden name and took to good works. She's hand and glove with the missionaries—teaches elocution, and helps in amateur dramatic shows. In fact, what I call a terrible woman—but definitely above suspicion of being mixed up in a murder. And now you say she's walked out on us! I can't understand it.' He paused a minute and then went on doubtfully: 'Perhaps she just got fed up with that hotel? I could have easily.'

Poirot said:

'Her luggage is still there. She took nothing with her.'

Japp swore.

'When did she go?'

'About a quarter-to-seven.'

'What about the hotel people?'

'They're very upset. Manageress looked quite distraught.'

'Why didn't they report to the police?'

'Because, mon cher, supposing that a lady does happen to stay out for a night (however unlikely it may seem from her appearance) she will be justifiably annoyed by finding on her return that the police have been called in. Mrs Harrison, the manageress in question, called up various hospitals in case there had been an accident. She was considering notifying the police when I called. My appearance seemed to her like an answer to a prayer. I charged myself with everything, and explained that I would enlist the help of a very discreet police officer.'

'The discreet police officer being yours truly, I suppose?'

'You suppose rightly.'

Japp groaned:

‘All right. I’ll meet you at the Glengowrie Court Hotel after the inquest.’

V

Japp grumbled as they were waiting for the manageress.

‘What does the woman want to disappear for?’

‘It is curious, you admit?’

They had no time for more.

Mrs Harrison, proprietor of the Glengowrie Court, was with them. Mrs Harrison was voluble and almost tearful. She was so worried about Miss Sainsbury Seale. What could have happened to her? Rapidly she went over every possibility of disaster. Loss of memory, sudden illness, haemorrhage, run down by an omnibus, robbery and assault

—
She paused at last for breath, murmuring:

‘Such a nice type of woman—and she seemed so happy and comfortable here.’

She took them, at Japp’s request, up to the chaste bedroom occupied by the missing lady. Everything was neat and orderly. Clothes hung in the wardrobe, nightclothes were folded ready on the bed, in a corner were Miss Sainsbury Seale’s two modest suitcases. A row of shoes stood under the dressing-table—some serviceable Oxfords, two pairs of rather meretricious glacé fancy shoes with court heels and ornament with bows of leather, some plain black satin evening shoes, practically new, and a pair of moccasins. Poirot noted that the evening shoes were a size smaller than the day ones—a fact that might be put down to corns or to vanity. He wondered whether Miss Sainsbury Seale had found time to sew the second buckle on her shoe before she went out. He hoped so. Slovenliness in dress always annoyed him.

Japp was busy looking through some letters in a drawer of the dressing-table. Hercule Poirot gingerly pulled open a drawer of the chest of drawers. It was full of underclothing. He shut it again modestly, murmuring that Miss Sainsbury Seale seemed to believe in wearing wool next to the skin, and opened another drawer which contained stockings.

Japp said:

‘Got anything, Poirot?’

Poirot said sadly, as he dangled a pair: ‘Ten inch, cheap shiny silk, price probably two-and-eleven.’

Japp said:

‘You’re not valuing for probate, old boy. Two letters here from India, one or two receipts from charitable organizations, no bills. Most estimable character, our Miss Sainsbury Seale.’

‘But very little taste in dress,’ said Poirot sadly.

‘Probably thought dress wordly.’ Japp was noting down an address from an old letter dated two months back.

‘These people may know something about her,’ he said. ‘Address up Hampstead way. Sound as though they were fairly intimate.’

There was nothing more to be gleaned at the Glengowrie Court Hotel except the negative fact that Miss Sainsbury Seale had not seemed excited or worried in any way when she went out, and it would appear that she had definitely intended to return since on passing her friend Mrs Bolitho in the hall, she had called out:

‘After dinner I will show you that Patience I was telling you about.’

Moreover, it was the custom at the Glengowrie Court to give notice in the dining-room if you intended to be out for a meal. Miss Sainsbury Seale had not done so. Therefore it seemed clear that she had intended returning for dinner which was served from seven-thirty to eight-thirty. But she had not returned. She had walked out into the Cromwell Road and disappeared. Japp and Poirot called at the address in West Hampstead which had headed the letter found. It was a pleasant house and the Adams were pleasant people with a large family. They had lived in India for many years and spoke warmly of Miss Sainsbury Seale. But they could not help. They had not seen her lately, not for a month, not in fact since they came back from their Easter holidays. She had been staying then at a hotel near Russell Square. Mrs Adams gave Poirot the address of it and also the address of some other Anglo-Indian friends of Miss Sainsbury Seale's who lived in Streatham.

But the two men drew a blank in both places. Miss Sainsbury Seale had stayed at the hotel in question, but they remembered very little about her and nothing that could be of any help. She was a nice quiet lady and had lived abroad. The people in Streatham were no help either. They had not seen Miss Sainsbury Seale since February.

There remained the possibility of an accident, but that possibility was dispelled too. No hospital had admitted any casualty answering to the description given.

Miss Sainsbury Seale had disappeared into space.

VI

On the following morning, Poirot went to the Holborn Palace Hotel and asked for Mr Howard Raikes. By this time it would hardly have surprised him to hear that Mr Howard Raikes, too, had stepped out one evening and had never returned.

Mr Howard Raikes, however, was still at the Holborn Palace and was said to be breakfasting. The apparition of Hercule Poirot at the breakfast table seemed to give Mr Howard Raikes doubtful pleasure.

Though not looking so murderous as in Poirot's disordered recollection of him, his scowl was still formidable—he stared at his uninvited guest and said ungraciously:

'What the hell?'

'You permit?'

Hercule Poirot drew a chair from another table.

Mr Raikes said:

'Don't mind me! Sit down and make yourself at home!'

Poirot smiling availed himself of the permission.

Mr Raikes said ungraciously:

'Well, what do you want?'

'Do you remember me at all, Mr Raikes?'

'Never set eyes on you in my life.'

'There you are wrong. You sat in the same room with me for at least five minutes not more than three days ago.'

'I can't remember every one I meet at some God-damned party or other.'

'It was not a party,' said Poirot. 'It was a dentist's waiting-room.'

Some swift emotion flashed into the young man's eyes and died again at once. His manner changed. It was no longer impatient and casual. It became suddenly wary. He looked across at Poirot and said:

‘Well!’

Poirot studied him carefully before replying. He felt, quite positively, that this was indeed a dangerous young man. A lean hungry face, an aggressive jaw, the eyes of a fanatic. It was a face, though, that women might find attractive. He was untidily, even shabbily dressed, and he ate with a careless voraciousness that was, so the man watching him thought, significant. Poirot summed him up to himself.

‘It is a wolf with ideas...’

Raikes said harshly:

‘What the hell do you mean—coming here like this?’

‘My visit is disagreeable to you?’

‘I don’t even know who you are.’

‘I apologize.’

Dexterously Poirot whipped out his card case. He extracted a card and passed it across the table. Again that emotion that he could not quite define showed upon Mr Raikes’ lean face. It was not fear—it was more aggressive than fear. After it, quite unquestionably, came anger. He tossed the card back.

‘So that’s who you are, is it? I’ve heard of you.’

‘Most people have,’ said Hercule Poirot modestly.

‘You’re a private dick, aren’t you? The expensive kind. The kind people hire when money is no object—when it’s worth paying anything in order to save their miserable skins!’

‘If you do not drink your coffee,’ said Hercule Poirot, ‘it will get cold.’

He spoke kindly and with authority.

Raikes stared at him.

‘Say, just what kind of an insect are you?’

‘The coffee in this country is very bad anyway—’ said Poirot.

‘I’ll say it is,’ agreed Mr Raikes with fervour.

‘But if you allow it to get cold it is practically undrinkable.’

The young man leant forward.

‘What are you getting at? What’s the big idea in coming round here?’

Poirot shrugged his shoulders.

‘I wanted to—see you.’

‘Oh yes?’ said Mr Raikes sceptically.

His eyes narrowed.

‘If it’s the money you’re after, you’ve come to the wrong man! The people I’m in with can’t afford to buy what they want. Better go back to the man who pays your salary.’

Poirot said, sighing:

‘Nobody has paid me anything—yet.’

‘You’re telling me,’ said Mr Raikes.

‘It is the truth,’ said Hercule Poirot. ‘I am wasting a good deal of valuable time for no recompense whatsoever. Simply, shall we say, to assuage my curiosity.’

‘And I suppose,’ said Mr Raikes, ‘you were just assuaging your curiosity at that darned dentist’s the other day.’

Poirot shook his head. He said:

‘You seem to overlook the most ordinary reason for being in a dentist’s waiting-room—which is that one is waiting to have one’s teeth attended to.’

‘So that’s what you were doing?’ Mr Raikes’ tone expressed contemptuous unbelief. ‘Waiting to have your teeth seen to?’

‘Certainly.’

‘You’ll excuse me if I say I don’t believe it.’

‘May I ask then, Mr Raikes, what you were doing there?’

Mr Raikes grinned suddenly. He said:

‘Got you there! I was waiting to have my teeth seen to also.’

‘You had perhaps the toothache?’

‘That’s right, big boy.’

‘But all the same, you went away without having your teeth attended to?’

‘What if I did? That’s my business.’

He paused—then he said, with a quick savagery of tone: ‘Oh, what the hell’s the use of all this slick talking? You were there to look after your big shot. Well, he’s all right, isn’t he? Nothing happened to your precious Mr Alistair Blunt. You’ve nothing on me.’

Poirot said:

‘Where did you go when you went so abruptly out of the waiting-room?’

‘Left the house, of course.’

‘Ah!’ Poirot looked up at the ceiling.

‘But nobody saw you leave, Mr Raikes.’

‘Does that matter?’

‘It might. Somebody died in that house not long afterwards, remember.’

Raikes said carelessly:

‘Oh, you mean the dentist fellow.’

Poirot's tone was hard as he said:

'Yes, I mean the dentist fellow.'

Raikes stared. He said:

'You trying to pin that on me? Is that the game? Well, you can't do it. I've just read the account of the inquest yesterday. The poor devil shot himself because he'd made a mistake with a local anaesthetic and one of his patients died.'

Poirot went on unmoved: 'Can you prove that you left the house when you say you did? Is there anyone who can say definitely where you were between twelve and one?'

The other's eyes narrowed.

'So you are trying to pin it on me? I suppose Blunt put you up to this?'

Poirot sighed. He said:

'You will pardon me, but it seems an obsession with you—this persistent harping on Mr Alistair Blunt. I am not employed by him, I never have been employed by him. I am concerned, not with his safety, but with the death of a man who did good work in his chosen profession.'

Raikes shook his head.

'Sorry,' he said, 'I don't believe you. You're Blunt's private dick all right.' His face darkened as he leaned across the table. 'But you can't save him, you know. He's got to go—he and everything he stands for! There's got to be a new deal—the old corrupt system of finance has got to go—this cursed net of bankers all over the world like a spider's web. They've got to be swept away. I've nothing against Blunt personally—but he's the type of man I hate. He's mediocre—he's smug. He's the sort you can't move unless you use dynamite. He's the sort of man who says, "You can't disrupt the foundations of civilization." Can't you, though? Let him wait and see! He's an obstruction in the way of Progress and he's got to be removed. There's no room in the world today for men like Blunt—men who hark back to the past—men who want to live as their fathers lived or even as their grandfathers lived! You've got a lot of them here in England—crusted old diehards—useless, worn-out symbols of a decayed era. And, my God, they've got to go! There's got to be a new world. Do you get me—a new world, see?'

Poirot sighed and rose. He said:

'I see, Mr Raikes, that you are an idealist.'

'What if I am?'

'Too much of an idealist to care about the death of a dentist.'

Mr Raikes said scornfully:

'What does the death of one miserable dentist matter?'

Hercule Poirot said:

'It does not matter to you. It matters to me. That is the difference between us.'

VII

Poirot arrived home to be informed by George that a lady was waiting to see him.

'She is—ahem—a little nervous, sir,' said George.

Since the lady had given no name Poirot was at liberty to guess. He guessed wrong, for the young woman who rose agitatedly from the sofa as he entered was the late Mr Morley's secretary, Miss Gladys Nevill.

'Oh, dear, M. Poirot. I am so sorry to worry you like this—and really I don't know how I had the courage to come—I'm afraid you'll think it very bold of me—and I'm sure I don't want to take up your time—I know what time means to a busy professional man—but really I have been so unhappy—only I dare say you will think it all a waste of time —'

Profiting by a long experience of the English people, Poirot suggested a cup of tea. Miss Nevill's reaction was all that could be hoped for.

'Well, really, M. Poirot, that's very kind of you. Not that it's so very long since breakfast, but one can always do with a cup of tea, can't one?'

Poirot, who could always do without one, assented mendaciously. George was instructed to this effect, and in a miraculously short time Poirot and his visitor faced each other across a tea-tray.

'I must apologize to you,' said Miss Nevill, regaining her aplomb under the influence of the beverage,

'but as a matter of fact the inquest yesterday upset me a good deal.'

'I'm sure it must have done,' said Poirot kindly.

'There was no question of my giving evidence, or anything like that. But I felt somebody ought to go with Miss Morley. Mr Reilly was there, of course—but I meant a woman. Besides, Miss Morley doesn't like Mr Reilly. So I thought it was my duty to go.'

'That was very kind of you,' said Poirot encouragingly.

'Oh, no, I just felt I had to. You see, I have worked for Mr Morley for quite a number of years now—and the whole thing was a great shock to me—and of course the inquest made it worse—'

'I'm afraid it must have done.'

Miss Nevill leaned forward earnestly.

'But it's all wrong, M. Poirot. It really is all wrong.'

'What is wrong, Mademoiselle?'

'Well, it just couldn't have happened—not the way they make out—giving a patient an overdose in injecting the gum, I mean.'

'You think not.'

'I'm sure about it. Occasionally patients do suffer ill effects, but that is because they are physiologically unfit subjects—their heart action isn't normal. But I'm sure that an overdose is a very rare thing. You see practitioners get so into the habit of giving the regulation amount that it is absolutely mechanical—they'd give the right dose automatically.'

Poirot nodded approvingly. He said:

'That is what I thought myself, yes.'

'It's so standardized, you see. It's not like a chemist who is making up different amounts the whole time, or multiplying dosage where an error might creep in through inattention. Or a doctor who writes a great many different prescriptions. But a dentist isn't like that at all.'

Poirot asked:

‘You did not ask to be allowed to make these observations in the Coroner’s Court?’

Gladys Nevill shook her head. She twisted her fingers uncertainly.

‘You see,’ she broke out at last, ‘I was afraid of—of making things worse. Of course I know that Mr Morley wouldn’t do such a thing—but it might make people think that he had done it deliberately.’

Poirot nodded.

Gladys Nevill said:

‘That’s why I came to you, M. Poirot. Because with you it—it wouldn’t be official in any way. But I do think somebody ought to know how—how unconvincing the whole thing is!’

‘Nobody wants to know,’ said Poirot.

She stared at him, puzzled.

Poirot said:

‘I should like to know a little more about that telegram you received, summoning you away that day.’

‘Honestly, I don’t know what to think about that, M. Poirot. It does seem so queer. You see, it must have been sent by someone who knew all about me—and Aunt—where she lived and everything.’

‘Yes, it would seem as though it must have been sent by one of your intimate friends, or by someone who lived in the house and knew all about you.’

‘None of my friends would do such a thing, M. Poirot.’

‘You have no ideas yourself on the subject?’

The girl hesitated. She said slowly:

‘Just at first, when I realized that Mr Morley had shot himself, I wondered if he could possibly have sent it.’

‘You mean, out of consideration for you, to get you out of the way?’

The girl nodded.

‘But that really seemed a fantastic idea, even if he had got the idea of suicide in his mind that morning. It’s really very odd. Frank—my friend, you know—was quite absurd at first about it. He accused me of wanting to go off for the day with somebody else—as though I would do such a thing.’

‘Is there somebody else?’

‘No, of course there isn’t. But Frank has been so different lately—so moody and suspicious. Really, you know, it was losing his job and not being able to get another. Just hanging about is so bad for a man. I’ve been very worried about Frank.’

‘He was upset, was he not, to find you had gone away that day?’

‘Yes, you see, he came round to tell me he had got a new job—a marvellous job—ten pounds a week. And he couldn’t wait. He wanted me to know right away. And I think he wanted Mr Morley to know, too, because he’d been very hurt at the way Mr Morley didn’t appreciate him, and he suspected Mr Morley of trying to influence me against him.’

‘Which was true, was it not?’

'Well, yes, it was, in away ! Of course, Frank has lost a good many jobs and he hasn't been, perhaps, what most people would call very steady . But it will be different now. I think one can do so much by influence, don't you, M. Poirot? If a man feels a woman expects a lot of him, he tries to live up to her ideal of him.'

Poirot sighed. But he did not argue. He had heard many hundreds of women produce that same argument, with the same blithe belief in the redeeming power of a woman's love. Once in a thousand times, he supposed, cynically, it might be true.

He merely said:

'I should like to meet this friend of yours.'

'I'd love to have you meet him, M. Poirot. But just at present Sunday is his only free day. He's away in the country all the week, you see.'

'Ah, on the new job. What is the job, by the way?'

'Well, I don't exactly know, M. Poirot. Something in the secretarial line, I imagine. Or some government department. I know I have to send letters to Frank's London address and they get forwarded.'

'That is a little odd, is it not?'

'Well, I thought so—but Frank says it is often done nowadays.'

Poirot looked at her for a moment or two without speaking.

Then he said deliberately:

'Tomorrow is Sunday, is it not? Perhaps you would both give me the pleasure of lunching with me—at Logan's Corner House? I should like to discuss this sad business with you both.'

'Well—thank you, M. Poirot. I—yes, I'm sure we'd like to lunch with you very much.'

VIII

Frank Carter was a fair young man of medium height. His appearance was cheaply smart. He talked readily and fluently. His eyes were set rather close together and they had a way of shifting uneasily from side to side when he was embarrassed.

He was inclined to be suspicious and slightly hostile.

'I'd no idea we were to have the pleasure of lunching with you , M. Poirot. Gladys didn't tell me anything about it.'

He shot her a rather annoyed glance as he spoke.

'It was only arranged yesterday,' said Poirot, smiling. 'Miss Nevill is very upset by the circumstances of Mr Morley's death and I wondered if we put our heads together—'

Frank Carter interrupted him rudely.

'Morley's death? I'm sick of Morley's death! Why can't you forget him, Gladys? There wasn't anything so wonderful about him that I can see.'

'Oh, Frank, I don't think you ought to say that . Why, he left me a hundred pounds. I got the letter about it last night.'

'That's all right,' admitted Frank grudgingly. 'But after all, why shouldn't he? He worked you like a nigger—and who pocketed all the fat fees? Why, he did!'

'Well, of course he did—he paid me a very good salary.'

‘Not according to my ideas! You’re too humble altogether, Gladys, my girl, you let yourself be put upon, you know. I sized Morley up all right. You know as well as I do that he tried his best to get you to give me the chuck.’

‘He didn’t understand.’

‘He understood all right. The man’s dead now—otherwise I can tell you I’d have given him a piece of my mind.’

‘You actually came round to do so on the morning of his death, did you not?’ Hercule Poirot inquired gently.

Frank Carter said angrily:

‘Who’s been saying so?’

‘You did come round, did you not?’

‘What if I did? I wanted to see Miss Nevill here.’

‘But they told you she was away.’

‘Yes, and that made me pretty suspicious, I can tell you. I told that red-headed oaf I’d wait and see Morley myself. This business of putting Gladys against me had gone on long enough. I meant to tell Morley that, instead of being a poor unemployed rotter, I’d landed a good job and that it was about time Gladys handed in her notice and thought about her trousseau.’

‘But you did not actually tell him so?’

‘No, I got tired of waiting in that dingy mausoleum. I went away.’

‘What time did you leave?’

‘I can’t remember.’

‘What time did you arrive then?’

‘I don’t know. Soon after twelve, I should imagine.’

‘And you stayed half an hour—or longer—or less than half an hour?’

‘I don’t know, I tell you. I’m not the sort of chap who’s always looking at a clock.’

‘Was there anyone in the waiting-room while you were there?’

‘There was an oily fat bloke when I went in, but he wasn’t there long. After that I was alone.’

‘Then you must have left before half-past twelve—for at that time a lady arrived.’

‘Dare say I did. The place got on my nerves as I tell you.’

Poirot eyed him thoughtfully.

The bluster was uneasy—it did not ring quite true. And yet that might be explained by mere nervousness. Poirot’s manner was simple and friendly as he said:

‘Miss Nevill tells me that you have been very fortunate and have found a very good job indeed.’

‘The pay’s good.’

‘Ten pounds a week, she tells me.’

‘That’s right. Not too dusty, is it? Shows I can pull it off when I set my mind to it.’

He swaggered a little.

‘Yes, indeed. And the work is not too arduous?’

Frank Carter said shortly:

‘Not too bad.’

‘And interesting?’

‘Oh, yes, quite interesting. Talking of jobs, I’ve always been interested to know how you private detectives go about things? I suppose there’s not much of the Sherlock Holmes touch really, mostly divorce nowadays?’

‘I do not concern myself with divorce.’

‘Really? Then I don’t see how you live.’

‘I manage, my friend, I manage.’

‘But you’re right at the top of the tree, aren’t you, M. Poirot?’ put in Gladys Nevill. ‘Mr Morley used to say so. I mean you’re the sort of person Royalty calls in, or the Home Office or Duchesses.’

Poirot smiled upon her.

‘You flatter me,’ he said.

IX

Poirot walked home through the deserted streets in a thoughtful frame of mind. When he got in, he rang up Japp.

‘Forgive my troubling you, my friend, but did you ever do anything in the matter of tracing that telegram that was sent to Gladys Nevill?’

‘Still harping on the subject? Yes, we did, as a matter of fact. There was a telegram and—rather clever—the aunt lives at Richbourne in Somerset. The telegram was handed in at Richbarn—you know, the London suburb.’

Hercule Poirot said appreciatively:

‘That was clever—yes, that was clever. If the recipient happened to glance at where the telegram was handed in, the word would look sufficiently like Richbourne to carry conviction.’

He paused.

‘Do you know what I think, Japp?’

‘Well?’

‘There are signs of brains in this business.’

‘Hercule Poirot wants it to be murder, so it’s got to be murder.’

‘How do you explain that telegram?’

‘Coincidence. Someone was hoaxing the girl.’

‘Why should they?’

‘Oh, my goodness, Poirot, why do people do things? Practical jokes, hoaxes. Misplaced sense of humour, that’s all.’

‘And somebody felt like being funny just on the day that Morley was going to make a mistake over an injection.’

‘There may have been a certain amount of cause and effect. Because Miss Nevill was away, Morley was more rushed than usual and consequently was more likely to make a mistake.’

‘I am still not satisfied.’

‘I dare say—but don’t you see where your view is leading you? If anybody got la Nevill out of the way, it was probably Morley himself. Making his killing of Amberiotis deliberate and not an accident.’

Poirot was silent. Japp said:

‘You see?’

Poirot said:

‘Amberiotis might have been killed in some other way.’

‘Not he. Nobody came to see him at the Savoy. He lunched up in his room. And the doctors say the stuff was definitely injected, not taken by mouth—it wasn’t in the stomach. So there you are. It’s a clear case.’

‘That is what we are meant to think.’

‘The A.C. is satisfied anyway.’

‘And he is satisfied with the disappearing lady?’

‘The Case of the Vanishing Seal? No, I can tell you, we’re still working on that. That woman’s got to be somewhere. You just can’t walk out into the street and disappear.’

‘She seems to have done so.’

‘For the moment. But she must be somewhere, alive or dead, and I don’t think she is dead.’

‘Why not?’

‘Because we’d have found her body by now.’

‘Oh, my Japp, do bodies always come to light so soon?’

‘I suppose you’re hinting that she’s been murdered now and that we’ll find her in a quarry, cut up in little pieces like Mrs Ruxton?’

‘After all, mon ami, you do have missing persons who are not found.’

‘Very seldom, old boy. Lots of women disappear, yes, but we usually find ’em, all right. Nine times out of ten it’s a case of good old sex. They’re somewhere with a man. But I don’t think it could be that with our Mabelle, do you?’

‘One never knows,’ said Poirot cautiously. ‘But I do not think it likely. So you are sure of finding her?’

‘We’ll find her all right. We’re publishing a description of her to the Press and we’re roping in the B.B.C.’

‘Ah,’ said Poirot, ‘I fancy that may bring developments.’

‘Don’t worry, old boy. We’ll find your missing beauty for you—woollen underwear and all.’

He rang off.

George entered the room with his usual noiseless tread. He set down on a little table a steaming pot of chocolate and some sugar biscuits.

‘Will there be anything else, sir?’

‘I am in great perplexity of mind, Georges.’

‘Indeed, sir? I am sorry to hear it.’

Hercule Poirot poured himself out some chocolate and stirred his cup thoughtfully. George stood deferentially waiting, recognizing the signs. There were moments when Hercule Poirot discussed his cases with his valet. He always said that he found George’s comments singularly helpful.

‘You are aware, no doubt, Georges, of the death of my dentist?’

‘Mr Morley, sir? Yes, sir. Very distressing, sir. He shot himself, I understand.’

‘That is the general understanding. If he did not shoot himself, he was murdered.’

‘Yes, sir.’

‘The question is, if he was murdered, who murdered him?’

‘Quite so, sir.’

‘There are only a certain number of people, Georges, who could have murdered him. That is to say the people who were actually in, or could have been in, the house at the time.’

‘Quite so, sir.’

‘Those people are: a cook and housemaid, amiable domestics and highly unlikely to do anything of the kind. A devoted sister, also highly unlikely, but who does inherit her brother’s money such as it was—and one can never entirely neglect the financial aspect. An able and efficient partner—no motive known. A somewhat bone-headed page-boy addicted to cheap crime stories. And lastly, a Greek gentleman of somewhat doubtful antecedents.’

George coughed.

‘These foreigners, sir—’

‘Exactly. I agree perfectly. The Greek gentleman is decidedly indicated. But you see, Georges, the Greek gentleman also died and apparently it was Mr Morley who killed him—whether by intention or as the result of an unfortunate error we cannot be sure.’

‘It might be, sir, that they killed each other. I mean, sir, each gentleman had formed the idea of doing the other gentleman in, though of course each gentleman was unaware of the other gentleman’s intention.’

Hercule Poirot purred approvingly.

‘Very ingenious, Georges. The dentist murders the unfortunate gentleman who sits in the chair, not realizing that the said victim is at that moment meditating exactly at what moment to whip out his pistol. It could, of course, be so but it seems to me, Georges, extremely unlikely. And we have not come to the end of our list yet. There are still two other people who might possibly have been in the house at the given moment. Every patient, before Mr Amberiotis, was actually seen to leave the house with the exception of one—a young American gentleman. He left the waiting-room at about twenty minutes to twelve, but no one actually saw him leave the house. We must therefore count him as a possibility. The other possibility is a certain Mr Frank Carter (nota patient) who came to the house at a little after twelve with the intention of seeing Mr Morley. Nobody saw him leave, either. Those, my good Georges, are the facts; what do you think of them?’

‘At what time was the murder committed, sir?’

‘If the murder was committed by Mr Amberiotis, it was committed at any time between twelve and five-and-twenty past. If by somebody else, it was committed after twenty-five minutes past twelve, as otherwise Mr Amberiotis would have noticed the corpse.’

He looked encouragingly at George.

‘Now, my good Georges, what have you to say about the matter?’

George pondered. He said:

‘It strikes me, sir—’

‘Yes, Georges?’

‘You will have to find another dentist to attend to your teeth in future, sir.’

Hercule Poirot said:

‘You surpass yourself, Georges. That aspect of the matter had not as yet occurred to me!’

Looking gratified, George left the room.

Hercule Poirot remained sipping his chocolate and going over the facts he had just outlined. He felt satisfied that they were as he had stated them. Within that circle of persons was the hand that had actually done the deed—no matter whose the inspiration had been.

Then his eyebrows shot up as he realized that the list was incomplete. He had left out one name. And no one must be left out—not even the most unlikely person.

There had been one other person in the house at the time of the murder. He wrote down:

‘Mr Barnes.’

X

George announced:

‘A lady to speak to you on the telephone, sir.’

A week ago, Poirot had guessed wrongly the identity of a visitor. This time his guess was right. He recognized her voice at once.

‘M. Hercule Poirot?’

‘Speaking.’

‘This is Jane Olivera—Mr Alistair Blunt’s niece.’

‘Yes, Miss Olivera.’

‘Could you come to the Gothic House, please? There is something I feel you ought to know.’

‘Certainly. What time would be convenient?’

‘At six-thirty, please.’

‘I will be there.’

For a moment the autocratic note wavered:

‘I—I hope I am not interrupting your work?’

‘Not at all. I was expecting you to call me.’

He put down the receiver quickly. He moved away from it smiling. He wondered what excuse Jane Olivera had found for summoning him.

On arrival at the Gothic House he was shown straight into the big library overlooking the river. Alistair Blunt was sitting at the writing-table playing absent-mindedly with a paper-knife. He had the slightly harassed look of a man whose womenfolk have been too much for him. Jane Olivera was standing by the mantelpiece. A plump middle-aged woman was speaking fretfully as Poirot entered—‘and I really think my feelings should be considered in the matter, Alistair.’

‘Yes, Julia, of course, of course.’

Alistair Blunt spoke soothingly as he rose to greet Poirot.

‘And if you’re going to talk horrors I shall leave the room,’ added the good lady.

‘I should, mother,’ said Jane Olivera.

Mrs Olivera swept from the room without condescending to take any notice of Poirot. Alistair Blunt said:

‘It’s very good of you to come, M. Poirot. You’ve met Miss Olivera, I think? It was she who sent for you—’

Jane said abruptly:

‘It’s about this missing woman that the papers are full of. Miss Something Seale.’

‘Sainsbury Seale? Yes?’

Jane turned once more to Poirot.

‘It’s such a pompous name, that’s why I remember. Shall I tell him, or will you, Uncle Alistair?’

‘My dear, it’s your story.’

Jane turned once more to Poirot.

‘It mayn’t be important in the least—but I thought you ought to know.’

‘Yes?’

‘It was the last time Uncle Alistair went to the dentist’s—I don’t mean the other day—I mean about three months ago. I went with him to Queen Charlotte Street in the Rolls and it was to take me on to some friends in Regent’s Park and come back for him. We stopped at 58, and Uncle got out, and just as he did, a woman came out of 58—a middle-aged woman with fussy hair and rather arty clothes. She made a bee-line for Uncle and said (Jane Olivera’s voice rose to an affected squeak): “Oh, Mr Blunt, you don’t remember me, I’m sure!” Well, of course, I could see by Uncle’s face that he didn’t remember her in the slightest—’

Alistair Blunt sighed.

‘I never do. People are always saying it—’

‘He put on his special face,’ went on Jane. ‘I know it well. Kind of polite and make-believe. It wouldn’t deceive a baby. He said in a most unconvincing voice: “Oh—er—of course.” The terrible woman went on: “I was a great friend of your wife’s, you know!”’

'They usually say that, too,' said Alistair Blunt in a voice of even deeper gloom. He smiled rather ruefully.

'It always ends the same way! A subscription to something or other. I got off this time with five pounds to a Zenana Mission or something. Cheap!'

'Had she really known your wife?'

'Well, her being interested in Zenana Missions made me think that, if so, it would have been in India. We were there about ten yours ago. But, of course, she couldn't have been a great friend or I'd have known about it. Probably met her once at a reception.'

Jane Olivera said:

'I don't believe she'd ever met Aunt Rebecca at all. I think it was just an excuse to speak to you.'

Alistair Blunt said tolerantly:

'Well, that's quite possible.'

Jane said:

'I mean, I think it'squeer the way she tried to scrape an acquaintance with you, Uncle.'

Alistair Blunt said with the same tolerance:

'She did not try to follow it up in any way?'

Blunt shook his head.

'I never thought of her again. I'd even forgotten her name till Jane spotted it in the paper.'

Jane said a little unconvincingly:

'Well,I thought M. Poirot ought to be told!'

Poirot said politely:

'Thank you, Mademoiselle.'

He added:

'I must not keep you, Mr Blunt. You are a busy man.'

Jane said quickly:

'I'll come down with you.'

Under his moustaches, Hercule Poirot smiled to himself.

On the ground floor, Jane paused abruptly. She said:

'Come in here.'

They went into a small room off the hall.

She turned to face him.

'What did you mean on the telephone when you said that you had been expecting me to call you?'

Poirot smiled. He spread out his hands.

‘Just that, Mademoiselle. I was expecting a call from you—and the call came.’

‘You mean that you knew I’d ring up about this Sainsbury Seale woman.’

Poirot shook his head.

‘That was only the pretext. You could have found something else if necessary.’

Jane said:

‘Why the hell should I call you up?’

‘Why should you deliver this titbit of information about Miss Sainsbury Seale to me instead of giving it to Scotland Yard? That would have been the natural thing to do.’

‘All right, Mr Know All, how much exactly do you know?’

‘I know that you are interested in me since you heard that I paid a visit to the Holborn Palace Hotel the other day.’

She went so white that it startled him. He had not believed that that deep tan could change to such a greenish hue.

He went on, quietly and steadily:

‘You got me to come here today because you wanted to pump me—that is the expression, is it not?—yes, to pump me on the subject of Mr Howard Raikes.’

Jane Olivera said:

‘Who’s he, anyway?’

It was not a very successful parry.

Poirot said:

‘You do not need to pump me, Mademoiselle. I will tell you what I know—or rather what I guessed. That first day that we came here, Inspector Japp and I, you were startled to see us—alarmed. You thought something had happened to your uncle. Why?’

‘Well, he’s the kind of man things might happen to. He had a bomb by post one day—after the Herjoslovakian Loan. And he gets lots of threatening letters.’

Poirot went on:

‘Chief Inspector Japp told you that a certain dentist, Mr Morley, had been shot. You may recollect your answer. You said: “But that’s absurd.”’

Jane bit her lip. She said:

‘Did I? That was rather absurd of me, wasn’t it?’

‘It was a curious remark, Mademoiselle. It revealed that you knew of the existence of Mr Morley, that you had rather expected something to happen—not to happen to him—but possibly to happen in his house.’

‘You do like telling yourself stories, don’t you?’

Poirot paid no attention.

‘You had expected—or rather you had feared—that something might happen at Mr Morley’s house. You had feared that that something would have happened to your uncle. But if so, you must know something that we did not know. I reflected on the people who had been in Mr Morley's house that day, and I seized at once on the one person who might possibly have a connection with you—which was that young American, Mr Howard Raikes.'

'It's just like a serial, isn't it? What's the next thrilling instalment?'

'I went to see Mr Howard Raikes. He is a dangerous and attractive young man—'

Poirot paused expressively.

Jane said meditatively:

'He is, isn't he?' She smiled. 'All right! You win! I was scared stiff.'

She leaned forward.

'I'm going to tell you things, M. Poirot. You're not the kind one can just string along. I'd rather tell you than have you snooping around finding out. I love that man, Howard Raikes. I'm just crazy about him. My mother brought me over here just to get me away from him. Partly that and partly because she hopes Uncle Alistair might get fond enough of me to leave me his money when he dies.'

She went on:

'Mother is his niece by marriage. Her mother was Rebecca Arnholt's sister. He's my great-uncle-in-law. Only he hasn't got any near relatives of his own, so mother doesn't see why we shouldn't be his residuary legatees. She cadges off him pretty freely too.'

'You see, I'm being frank with you, M. Poirot. That's the kind of people we are. Actually we've got plenty of money ourselves—an indecent amount according to Howard's ideas—but we're not in Uncle Alistair's class.'

She paused. She struck with one hand fiercely on the arm of her chair.

'How can I make you understand? Everything I've been brought up to believe in, Howard abominates and wants to do away with. And sometimes, you know, I feel like he does. I'm fond of Uncle Alistair, but he gets on my nerves sometimes. He's sostodgy —so British—so cautious and conservative. I feel sometimes that he and his kind ought to be swept away, that they are blocking progress—that without them we'd get things done !'

'You are a convert to Mr Raikes' ideas?'

'I am—and I'm not. Howard is—is wilder than most of his crowd. There are people, you know, who—who agree with Howard up to a point. They would be willing to—to try things—if Uncle Alistair and his crowd would agree. But they never will! They just sit back and shake their heads and say: "We could never risk that." And "It wouldn't be sound economically." And "We've got to consider our responsibility." And "Look at history." But I think that one mustn't look at history. That's looking back. One must look forward all the time.'

Poirot said gently:

'It is an attractive vision.'

Jane looked at him scornfully.

'You say that too!'

'Perhaps because I am old. Their old men have dreams —only dreams, you see.'

He paused and then asked in a matter-of-fact voice:

'Why did Mr Howard Raikes make that appointment in Queen Charlotte Street?'

‘Because I wanted him to meet Uncle Alistair and I couldn’t see otherwise how to manage it. He’d been so bitter about Uncle Alistair—so full of—well, hate really, that I felt if he could only see him—see what a nice kindly unassuming person he was—that—that he would feel differently...I couldn’t arrange a meeting here because of mother—she would have spoiled everything.’

Poirot said:

‘But after having made that arrangement, you were—afraid.’

Her eyes grew wide and dark. She said:

‘Yes. Because—because—sometimes Howard gets carried away. He—he—’

Hercule Poirot said:

‘He wants to take a short cut. To exterminate—’

Jane Olivera cried: ‘Don’t!’

Seven, Eight,

Lay them Straight

I

Time went on. It was over a month since Mr Morley’s death, and there was still no news of Miss Sainsbury Seale.

Japp became increasingly wrathful on the subject.

‘Dash it all, Poirot, the woman’s got to be somewhere.’

‘Indubitably, mon cher.’

‘Either she’d dead or alive. If she’s dead, where’s her body? Say, for instance, she committed suicide—’

‘Another suicide?’

‘Don’t let’s get back to that. You still say Morley was murdered—Isay it was suicide.’

‘You haven’t traced the pistol?’

‘No, it’s a foreign make.’

‘That is suggestive, is it not?’

‘Not in the way you mean. Morley had been abroad. He went on cruises, he and his sister. Everybody in the British Isles goes on cruises. He may have picked it up abroad. They like to feel life’s dangerous.’

He paused and said:

‘Don’t sidetrack me. I was saying that if —only if, mind you—that blasted woman committed suicide, if she’d drowned herself for instance, the body would have come ashore by now. If she was murdered, the same thing.’

‘Not if a weight was attached to her body and it was put into the Thames.’

‘From a cellar in Limehouse, I suppose! You’re talking like a thriller by a lady novelist.’

‘I know—I know. I blush when I say these things!’

‘And she was done to death by an international gang of crooks, I suppose?’

Poirot sighed. He said:

‘I have been told lately that there really are such things.’

‘Who told you so?’

‘Mr Reginald Barnes of Castlegarden Road, Ealing.’

‘Well, he might know,’ said Japp dubiously. ‘He dealt with aliens when he was at the Home Office.’

‘And you do not agree?’

‘It isn’t my branch—oh yes, there are such things—but they’re rather futile as a rule.’

There was a momentary silence as Poirot twirled his moustache.

Japp said:

‘We’ve got one or two additional bits of information. She came home from India on the same boat as Amberiotis. But she was second class and he was first, so I don’t suppose there’s anything in that, although one of the waiters at the Savoy thinks she lunched there with him about a week or so before he died.’

‘So there may have been a connection between them?’

‘There may be—but I can’t feel it’s likely. I can’t see a Missionary lady being mixed up in any funny business.’

‘Was Amberiotis mixed up in any “funny business”, as you term it?’

‘Yes, he was. He was in close touch with some of our Central European friends. Espionage racket.’

‘You are sure of that?’

‘Yes. Oh, he wasn’t doing any of the dirty work himself. We wouldn’t have been able to touch him. Organizing and receiving reports—that was his lay.’

Japp paused and then went on:

‘But that doesn’t help us with the Sainsbury Seale. She wouldn’t have been in on that racket.’

‘She had lived in India, remember. There was a lot of unrest there last year.’

‘Amberiotis and the excellent Miss Sainsbury Seale—I can’t feel that they were team-mates.’

‘Did you know that Miss Sainsbury Seale was a close friend of the late Mrs Alistair Blunt?’

‘Who says so? I don’t believe it. Not in the same class.’

‘She said so.’

‘Who’d she say that to?’

‘Mr Alistair Blunt.’

‘Oh! That sort of thing. He must be used to that lay. Do you mean that Amberiotis was using her that way? It wouldn’t work. Blunt would get rid of her with a subscription. He wouldn’t ask her down for a week-end or anything of that kind. He’s not so unsophisticated as that.’

This was so palpably true that Poirot could only agree. After a minute or two, Japp went on with his summing up of the Sainsbury Seale situation.

‘I suppose her body might have been lowered into a tank of acid by a mad scientist—that’s another solution they’re very fond of in books! But take my word for it, these things are all my eye and Betty Martin. If the woman is dead, her body has just been quietly buried somewhere.’

‘But where?’

‘Exactly. She disappeared in London. Nobody’s got a garden there—not a proper one. A lonely chicken farm, that’s what we want!’

A garden! Poirot’s mind flashed suddenly to that neat prim garden in Ealing with its formal beds. How fantastic if a dead woman should be buried there! He told himself not to be absurd.

‘And if she isn’t dead,’ went on Japp, ‘where is she? Over a month now, description published in the Press, circulated all over England—’

‘And nobody has seen her?’

‘Oh yes, practically everybody has seen her! You’ve no idea how many middle-aged faded-looking women wearing olive green cardigan suits there are. She’s been seen on Yorkshire moors, and in Liverpool hotels, in guest houses in Devon and on the beach at Ramsgate! My men have spent their time patiently investigating all these reports—and one and all they’ve led nowhere, except to getting us in wrong with a number of perfectly respectable middle-aged ladies.’

Poirot clicked his tongue sympathetically.

‘And yet,’ went on Japp, ‘she’s a real person all right. I mean, sometimes you come across a dummy, so to speak—someone who just comes to a place and poses as a Miss Spinks—when all the time there isn’t a Miss Spinks. But this woman’s genuine—she’s got a past, a background! We know all about her from her childhood upwards! She’s led a perfectly normal, reasonable life—and suddenly, hey presto—vanish!’

‘There must be a reason,’ said Poirot.

‘She didn’t shoot Morley, if that’s what you mean. Amberiotis saw him alive after she left—and we’ve checked up on her movements after she left Queen Charlotte Street that morning.’

Poirot said impatiently:

‘I am not suggesting for a moment that she shot Morley. Of course she did not. But all the same—’

Japp said:

‘If you are right about Morley, then it’s far more likely that he told her something which, although she doesn’t suspect it, gives a clue to his murderer. In that case, she might have been deliberately got out of the way.’

Poirot said:

‘All this involves an organization, some big concern quite out of proportion to the death of a quiet dentist in Queen Charlotte Street.’

‘Don’t you believe everything Reginald Barnes tells you! He’s a funny old bird—got spies and communists on the brain.’

Japp got up and Poirot said:

‘Let me know if you have news.’

When Japp had gone out, Poirot sat frowning down at the table in front of him. He had definitely the feeling of waiting for something. What was it?

He remembered how he had sat before, jotting down various unrelated facts and a series of names. A bird had flown past the window with a twig in its mouth.

He, too, had been collecting twigs. Five, six, picking up sticks ...

He had the sticks—quite a number of them now. They were all there, neatly pigeonholed in his orderly mind—but he had not as yet attempted to set them in order. That was the next step—lay them straight. What was holding him up? He knew the answer. He was waiting for something. Something inevitable, fore-ordained, the next link in the chain. When it came—then—then he could go on...

II

It was late evening a week later when the summons came. Japp's voice was brusque over the telephone.

'That you, Poirot? We've found her. You'd better come round. King Leopold Mansions. Battersea Park. Number 45.'

A quarter of an hour later a taxi deposited Poirot outside King Leopold Mansions. It was a big block of mansion flats looking out over Battersea Park. Number 45 was on the second floor. Japp himself opened the door.

His face was set in grim lines.

'Come in,' he said. 'It's not particularly pleasant, but I expect you'll want to see for yourself.'

Poirot said—but it was hardly a question:

'Dead?'

'What you might describe as very dead!'

Poirot cocked his head at a familiar sound coming from a door on his right.

'That's the porter,' said Japp. 'Being sick in the scullery sink! I had to get him up here to see if he could identify her.'

He led the way down the passage and Poirot followed him. His nose wrinkled.

'Not nice,' said Japp. 'But what can you expect? She's been dead well over a month.'

The room they went into was a small lumber and box room. In the middle of it was a big metal chest of the kind used for storing furs. The lid was open.

Poirot stepped forward and looked inside.

He saw the foot first, with the shabby shoe on it and the ornate buckle. His first sight of Miss Sainsbury Seale had been, he remembered, a shoe buckle.

His gaze travelled up, over the green wool coat and skirt till it reached the head. He made an inarticulate noise.

'I know,' said Japp. 'It's pretty horrible.'

The face had been battered out of all recognizable shape. Add to that the natural process of decomposition, and it was no wonder that both men looked a shade pea green as they turned away.

'Oh well,' said Japp. 'It's all in a day's work—our day's work. No doubt about it, ours is a lousy job sometimes. There's a spot of brandy in the other room. You'd better have some.'

The living-room was smartly furnished in an up-to-date style—a good deal of chromium and some large square-looking easy chairs upholstered in a pale fawn geometric fabric. Poirot found the decanter and helped himself to some brandy. As he finished drinking, he said:

‘It was not pretty, that! Now tell me, my friend, all about it.’

Japp said:

‘This flat belongs to a Mrs Albert Chapman. Mrs Chapman is, I gather, a well-upholstered smart blonde of forty-odd. Pays her bills, fond of an occasional game of bridge with her neighbours but keeps herself to herself more or less. No children. Mr Chapman is a commercial traveller.

‘Sainsbury Seale came here on the evening of our interview with her. About seven-fifteen. So she probably came straight here from the Glengowrie Court. She’d been here once before, so the porter says. You see, all perfectly clear and above-board—nice friendly call. The porter took Miss Sainsbury Seale up in the lift to this flat. The last he saw of her was standing on the mat pressing the bell.’

Poirot commented:

‘He has taken his time to remember this!’

‘He’s had gastric trouble, it seems, been away in hospital while another man took on temporarily for him. It wasn’t until about a week ago that he happened to notice in an old paper the description of a

“wanted woman” and he said to his wife, “Sounds quite like that old cup of tea who came to see Mrs Chapman on the second floor. She had on a green wool dress and buckles on her shoes.” And after about another hour he registered again—“Believe she had a name, too, something like that. Blimey, it was

—Miss Something or other Seale!”

‘After that,’ continued Japp, ‘it took him about four days to overcome his natural distrust of getting mixed up with the police and come along with his information.

‘We didn’t really think it would lead to anything. You’ve no idea how many of these false alarms we’ve had. However, I sent Sergeant Beddoes along—he’s a bright young fellow. A bit too much of this high-class education but he can’t help that. It’s fashionable now.

‘Well, Beddoes got a hunch at once that we were on to something at last. For one thing this Mrs Chapman hadn’t been seen about for over a month. She’d gone away without leaving any address. That was a bit odd. In fact everything he could learn about Mr and Mrs Chapman seemed odd.

‘He found out the porter hadn’t seen Miss Sainsbury Seale leave again. That in itself wasn’t unusual. She might easily have come down the stairs and gone out without his seeing her. But then the porter told him that Mrs Chapman had gone away rather suddenly. There was just a big printed notice outside the door the next morning:

NO MILK. TELL NELLIE I AM CALLED AWAY.

‘Nellie was the daily maid who did for her. Mrs Chapman had gone away suddenly once or twice before, so the girl didn’t think it odd, but what was odd was the fact that she hadn’t rung for the porter to take her luggage down or get her a taxi.

‘Anyway, Beddoes decided to get into the flat. We got a search warrant and a pass key from the manager. Found nothing of interest except in the bathroom. There had been some hasty clearing up done there. There was a trace of blood on the linoleum—in the corners where it had been missed when the floor was washed over. After that, it was just a question of finding the body. Mrs Chapman couldn’t have left with any luggage with her or the porter would have known. Therefore the body must still be in the flat. We soon spotted that fur chest—airtight, you know—just the place. Keys were in the dressing-table drawer.

‘We opened it up—and there was the missing lady! Mistletoe Bough up-to-date.’

Poirot asked:

‘What about Mrs Chapman?’

‘What indeed? Who is Sylvia (her name’s Sylvia, by the way), what is she? One thing is certain. Sylvia, or Sylvia’s friends, murdered the lady and put her in the box.’

Poirot nodded.

He asked:

‘But why was her face battered in? It is not nice, that.’

‘I’ll say it isn’t nice! As towhy —well, one can only guess. Sheer vindictiveness, perhaps. Or it may have been with the idea of concealing the woman’s identity.’

‘But it didnot conceal her identity.’

‘No, because not only had we got a pretty good description of what Mabelle Sainsbury Seale was wearing when she disappeared, but her handbag had been stuffed into the fur box too and inside the handbag there was actually an old letter addressed to her at her hotel in Russell Square.’

Poirot sat up. He said:

‘But that—that does not make the common sense!’

‘It certainly doesn’t. I suppose it was a slip.’

‘Yes—perhaps—a slip. But—’

He got up.

‘You have been over the flat?’

‘Pretty well. There’s nothing illuminating.’

‘I should like to see Mrs Chapman’s bedroom.’

‘Come along then.’

The bedroom showed no signs of a hasty departure. It was neat and tidy. The bed had not been slept in, but was turned down ready for the night. There was a thick coating of dust everywhere. Japp said:

‘No finger-prints, so far as we can see. There are some on the kitchen things, but I expect they’ll turn out to be the maid’s.’

‘That means that the whole place was dusted very carefully after the murder?’

‘Yes.’

Poirot’s eyes swept slowly round the room. Like the sitting-room it was furnished in the modern style—and furnished, so he thought, by someone with a moderate income. The articles in it were expensive but not ultra expensive. They were showy but not first-class. The colour scheme was rose pink. He looked into the built-in wardrobe and handled the clothes—smart clothes but again not of first-class quality. His eyes fell to the shoes—they were largely of the sandal variety popular at the moment, some had exaggerated cork soles. He balanced one in his hand, registered the fact that Mrs Chapman had taken a 5 in shoes and put it down again. In another cupboard he found a pile of furs, shoved in a heap.

Japp said:

‘Came out of the fur chest.’

Poirot nodded.

He was handling a grey squirrel coat. He remarked appreciatively: ‘First-class skins.’

He went into the bathroom.

There was a lavish display of cosmetics. Poirot looked at them with interest. Powder, rouge, vanishing cream, skin food, two bottles of hair application.

Japp said:

‘Not one of our natural platinum blondes, I gather.’

Poirot murmured:

‘At forty, mon ami, the hair of most women has begun to go grey but Mrs Chapman was not one to yield to nature.’

‘She’s probably gone henna red by now for a change.’

‘I wonder.’

Japp said:

‘There’s something worrying you, Poirot. What is it?’

Poirot said:

‘But yes, I am worried. I am very seriously worried. There is here, you see, for me an insoluble problem.’

Resolutely, he went once more into the box-room...

He took hold of the shoe on the dead woman’s foot. It resisted and came off with difficulty. He examined the buckle. It had been clumsily sewn on by hand.

Hercule Poirot sighed. He said:

‘It is that I am dreaming!’

Japp said curiously:

‘What are you trying to do—make the thing more difficult?’

‘Exactly that.’

Japp said:

‘One patent leather shoe, complete with buckle. What’s wrong with that?’

Hercule Poirot said:

‘Nothing—absolutely nothing. But all the same—I do not understand.’

III

Mrs Merton of No. 82, King Leopold Mansions had been designated by the porter as Mrs Chapman’s closest friend in the Mansions.

It was, therefore, to No. 82 that Japp and Poirot betook themselves next. Mrs Merton was a loquacious lady, with snapping black eyes, and an elaborate coiffure. It needed no pressure to make her talk. She was only too ready to rise to a dramatic situation.

‘Sylvia Chapman—well, of course, I don’t know her really well—not intimately, so to speak. We had a few bridge evenings occasionally and we went to the pictures together, and of course shopping sometimes. But oh, do tell me—she isn’t dead, is she?’

Japp reassured her.

‘Well, I’m sure I’m thankful to hear it! But the postman just now was all agog about a body having been found in one of the flats—but then one really can’t believe half one hears, can one? Inever do.’

Japp asked a further question.

‘No, I haven’t heard anything of Mrs Chapman—not since we had spoken about going to see the new Ginger Rogers and Fred Astaire the following week, and she said nothing about going away then.’

Mrs Merton had never heard a Miss Sainsbury Seale mentioned. Mrs Chapman had never spoken of anyone of that name.

‘And yet, you know, the name is familiar to me, distinctly familiar. I seem to have seen it somewhere quite lately.’

Japp said drily:

‘It’s been in all the papers for some weeks—’

‘Of course—some missing person, wasn’t it? And you thought Mrs Chapman might have known her?’

No, I’m sure I’ve never heard Sylvia mention that name.’

‘Can you tell me anything about Mr Chapman, Mrs Merton?’

A rather curious expression came over Mrs Merton’s face. She said:

‘He was a commercial traveller, I believe, so Mrs Chapman told me. He travelled abroad for his firm—armaments, I believe. He went all over Europe.’

‘Did you ever meet him?’

‘No, never. He was at home so seldom, and when he was at home he and Mrs Chapman didn’t want to bother with outsiders. Very naturally.’

‘Do you know if Mrs Chapman had any near relations or friends?’

‘I don’t know about friends. I don’t think she had any near relations. She never spoke of any.’

‘Was she ever in India?’

‘Not that I know of.’

Mrs Merton paused, and then broke out:

‘But please tell me—why are you asking all these questions? I quite understand that you come from Scotland Yard and all that, but there must be some special reason?’

‘Well, Mrs Merton, you are bound to know some time. As a matter of fact, a dead body has been found in Mrs Chapman’s flat.’

‘Oh—?’ Mrs Merton looked for a moment like the dog whose eyes were as big as saucers.

‘A dead body! It wasn’t Mr Chapman, was it? Or perhaps some foreigner?’

Japp said:

‘It wasn’t a man at all—it was a woman.’

‘A woman.’ Mrs Merton seemed even more surprised.

Poirot said gently:

‘Why should you think it was a man?’

‘Oh, I don’t know. It seemed more likely somehow.’

‘But why? Was it because Mrs Chapman was in the habit of receiving gentleman visitors?’

‘Oh no—oh no indeed.’ Mrs Merton was indignant. ‘I never meant anything of that kind. Sylvia Chapman wasn’t in the least that kind of woman—not at all! It was just that, with Mr Chapman—I mean—’

She came to a stop.

Poirot said:

‘I think, Madame, that you know a little more than you have told us.’

Mrs Merton said uncertainly:

‘I don’t know, I’m sure—what I ought to do! I mean, I don’t exactly want to betray a confidence and of course I never have repeated what Sylvia told me—except just to one or two intimates whom I knew were really safe —’

Mrs Merton leaned forward and lowered her voice:

‘It just—slipped out, as it were, one day. When we were seeing a film—about the Secret Service and Mrs Chapman said you could see that whoever had written it didn’t know much about their subject, and then it came out—only she swore me to secrecy. Mr Chapman was in the Secret Service, I mean. That was the real reason he had to go abroad so much. The armament firm was only a blind. And it was terribly worrying for Mrs Chapman because she couldn’t write to him or get letters from him while he was away. And, of course, it was terribly dangerous !’

IV

As they went down the stairs again to No. 42, Japp ejaculated with feeling: ‘Shades of Phillips Oppenheim, Valentine Williams and William le Queux, I think I’m going mad!’

That smart young man, Sergeant Beddoes, was waiting for them.

He said respectfully:

‘Haven’t been able to get anything helpful from the maid, sir. Mrs Chapman changed maids pretty often, it seems. This one only worked for her for a month or two. She says Mrs Chapman was a nice lady, fond of the radio and pleasant spoken. Girl was of the opinion the husband was a gay deceiver but that Mrs Chapman didn’t suspect it. She got letters from abroad sometimes, some from Germany, two from America, one from Italy and one from Russia. The girl’s young man collects stamps, and Mrs Chapman used to give them to her off the letters.’

‘Anything among Mrs Chapman’s papers?’

‘Absolutely nothing, sir. She didn’t keep much. A few bills and receipted accounts—all local. Some old theatre programmes, one or two cookery recipes cut out of the papers, and a pamphlet about Zenana Missions.’

‘And we can guess who brought that here. She doesn’t sound like a murderess, does she? And yet that’s what it seems to be. She’s bound to be an accomplice anyway. No strange men seen about that evening?’

‘The porter doesn’t remember any—but then I don’t suppose he would by now, and anyway it’s a big block of flats—people always going in and out. He can only fix the date of Miss Sainsbury Seale’s visit because he was taken off to the hospital the next day and was actually feeling rather bad that evening.’

‘Anybody in the other flats hear anything out of the way?’

The younger man shook his head.

‘I’ve inquired at the flat above this and the one below. Nobody can remember hearing anything unusual. Both of them had their radios on, I gather.’

The divisional surgeon came out of the bathroom where he had been washing his hands.

‘Most unsavoury corpse,’ he said cheerfully. ‘Send her along when you’re ready and I’ll get down to brass tacks.’

‘No idea of the cause of death, doctor?’

‘Impossible to say until I’ve done the autopsy. Those face injuries were definitely inflicted after death, I should say. But I shall know better when I’ve got her at the mortuary. Middle-aged woman, quite healthy—grey hair at the roots but tinted blonde. There may be distinguishing marks on the body—if there isn’t, it may be a job to identify her—oh, you know who she is, splendid? What? Missing woman there’s been all the fuss about? Well, you know, I never read the papers. Just do the crosswords.’

Japp said bitterly:

‘And that’s publicity for you!’ as the doctor went out.

Poirot was hovering over the desk. He picked up a small brown address book. The indefatigable Beddoes said:

‘Nothing of special interest there—most hairdressers, dressmakers, etc. I’ve noted down any private names and addresses.’

Poirot opened the book at the letter D.

He read:

Dr Davis, 17, Prince Albert Road,

Drake and Pomponetti, Fishmongers.

And below it:

Dentist. Mr Morley, 58, Queen Charlotte Street.

There was a green light in Poirot’s eyes. He said:

‘There will be no difficulty, I imagine, in positively identifying the body.’

Japp looked at him curiously. He said:

‘Surely—you don’t imagine—?’

Poirot said with vehemence:

‘I want to be sure.’

V

Miss Morley had moved to the country. She was living in a small country cottage near Hertford. The Grenadier greeted Poirot amicably. Since her brother's death her face had perhaps grown slightly grimmer, her carriage more upright, her general attitude towards life more unyielding. She resented bitterly the slur cast upon her brother's professional name by the findings of the inquest. Poirot, she had reason to believe, shared the view that the verdict of the Coroner's inquest was untrue. Hence the Grenadier unbent a little.

She answered his questions readily enough and with competence. All Mr Morley's professional papers had been carefully filed by Miss Nevill and had been handed over by her to Mr Morley's successor. Some of the patients had transferred themselves to Mr Reilly, others had accepted the new partner, others again had gone to other dentists elsewhere.

Miss Morley, after she had given what information she could, said:

'So you have found that woman who was Henry's patient—Miss Sainsbury Seale—and she was murdered too.'

The 'too' was a little defiant. She stressed the word.

Poirot said:

'Your brother never mentioned Miss Sainsbury Seale particularly to you?'

'No, I don't remember his doing so. He would tell me if he had had a particularly trying patient, or if one of his patients had said something amusing he would pass it on to me, but we didn't usually talk about his work much. He was glad to forget it when the day was over. He was very tired sometimes.'

'Do you remember hearing of a Mrs Chapman amongst your brother's patients?'

'Chapman? No, I don't think so. Miss Nevill is really the person to help you over all this.'

'I am anxious to get in touch with her. Where is she now?'

'She has taken a post with a dentist in Ramsgate, I believe.'

'She has not married that young man Frank Carter yet?'

'No. I rather hope that will never come off. I don't like that young man, M. Poirot. I really don't. There is something wrong about him. I still feel that he hasn't really any proper moral sense.'

Poirot said:

'Do you think it is possible that he could have shot your brother?'

Miss Morley said slowly:

'I do feel perhaps that he would be capable of it—he has a very uncontrollable temper. But I don't really see that he had any motive—nor opportunity for that matter. You see, it wasn't as though Henry had succeeded in persuading Gladys to give him up. She was sticking to him in the most faithful way.'

'Could he have been bribed, do you think?'

'Bribed? To kill my brother? What an extraordinary idea!'

A nice-looking dark-haired girl brought in the tea at this moment. As she closed the door behind her again, Poirot said:

'That girl was with you in London, was she not?'

‘Agnes? Yes, she was house-parlourmaid. I let the cook go—she didn’t want to come to the country anyway—and Agnes does everything for me. She is turning into quite a nice little cook.’

Poirot nodded.

He knew very accurately the domestic arrangements of 58, Queen Charlotte Street. They had been thoroughly gone into at the time of the tragedy. Mr Morley and his sister had occupied the two top floors of the house as a maisonette. The basement had been shut up altogether except for a narrow passage leading from the area to the back yard where a wire cage ran up to the top floor with the tradesmen’s deliveries and where a speaking-tube was installed. Therefore the only entrance to the house was by the front door which it was Alfred’s business to answer. This had enabled the police to be sure that no outsider could have entered the house on that particular morning. Both cook and house-parlourmaid had been with the Morleys for some years and bore good characters. So, although it was theoretically possible that one or the other of them might have crept down to the second floor and shot her master, the possibility had never been taken seriously into account. Neither of the two had appeared unduly flustered or upset at being questioned, and there certainly seemed no possible reason for connecting either of them with his death.

Nevertheless, as Agnes handed Poirot his hat and stick on leaving, she asked him with an unusually nervous abruptness:

‘Does—does anyone know anything more about the master’s death, sir?’

Poirot turned to look at her. He said:

‘Nothing fresh has come to light.’

‘They’re still quite sure as he did shoot himself because he’d made a mistake with that drug?’

‘Yes. Why do you ask?’

Agnes pleted her apron. Her face was averted. She said rather indistinctly:

‘The—the mistress doesn’t think so.’

‘And you agree with her, perhaps?’

‘Me? Oh, I don’t know nothing, sir. I only—I only wanted to be sure.’

Hercule Poirot said in his most gentle voice:

‘It would be a relief to you to feel beyond any possible doubt that it was suicide?’

‘Oh, yes, sir,’ Agnes agreed quickly, ‘it would indeed.’

‘For a special reason, perhaps?’

Her startled eyes met his. She shrank back a little.

‘I—I don’t know anything about it, sir. I only just asked.’

‘But why did she ask?’ Hercule Poirot demanded of himself, as he walked down the path to the gate. He felt sure that there was an answer to that question. But as yet he could not guess what it was. All the same, he felt a step nearer.

VI

When Poirot returned to his flat he was surprised to find an unexpected visitor waiting for him. A bald head was visible above the back of a chair, and the small neat figure of Mr Barnes rose to his feet.

With eyes that twinkled as usual, he made a dry little apology.

He had come, he explained, to return M. Hercule Poirot's visit.

Poirot professed himself delighted to see Mr Barnes.

George was instructed to bring some coffee unless his visitor preferred tea or whisky and soda?

'Coffee will be admirable,' said Mr Barnes. 'I imagine that your manservant prepares it well. Most English servants do not.'

Presently, after a few interchanges of polite remarks, Mr Barnes gave a little cough and said:

'I will be frank with you, M. Poirot. It was sheer curiosity that brought me here. You, I imagined, would be well posted in all the details of this rather curious case. I see by the papers that the missing Miss Sainsbury Seale has been found. That an inquest was held and adjourned for further evidence. Cause of death was stated to have been an overdose of medinal.'

'That is quite correct,' said Poirot.

There was a pause and then Poirot asked:

'Have you ever heard of Albert Chapman, Mr Barnes?'

'Ah, the husband of the lady in whose flat Miss Sainsbury Seale came to die? Rather an elusive person, it would seem.'

'But hardly non-existent?'

'Oh no,' said Mr Barnes. 'He exists. Oh yes, he exists—ordid exist. I had heard he was dead. But you can't trust these rumours.'

'Who was he, Mr Barnes?'

'I don't suppose they'll say at the inquest. Not if they can help it. They'll trot out the armaments firm traveller story.'

'Hewas in the Secret Service then?'

'Of course he was. But he had no business to tell his wife so—no business at all. In fact he ought not to have continued in the Service after his marriage. It isn't usually done—not, that is, when you're one of the really hush-hush people.'

'And Albert Chapman was?'

'Yes. Q.X.912. That's what he was known as. Using a name is most irregular. Oh, I don't mean that Q.X.912 was specially important—or anything of that kind. But he was useful because he was an insignificant kind of chap—the kind whose face isn't easily remembered. He was used a lot as a messenger up and down Europe. You know the sort of thing. One dignified letter sent via our Ambassador in Ruritania—one unofficial ditto containing the dirt per Q.X.912—that is to say: Mr Albert Chapman.'

'Then he knew a lot of useful information?'

'Probably didn't know a thing,' said Mr Barnes cheerfully. 'His job was just hopping in and out of trains and boats and aeroplanes and having the right story to explain why he was going where he was going!'

'And you heard he was dead?'

'That's what I heard,' said Mr Barnes. 'But you can't believe all you hear. I never do.'

Looking at Mr Barnes intently, Poirot asked:

‘What do you think has happened to his wife?’

‘I can’t imagine,’ said Mr Barnes. He looked, wide-eyed at Poirot. ‘Can you?’

Poirot said:

‘I had an idea—’ He stopped.

He said slowly:

‘It is very confusing.’

Mr Barnes murmured sympathetically: ‘Anything worrying you in particular?’

Hercule Poirot said slowly:

‘Yes. The evidence of my own eyes...’

VII

Japp came into Poirot’s sitting-room and slammed down his bowler hat with such force that the table rocked.

He said:

‘What the devil made you think of it?’

‘My good Japp, I do not know what you are talking about.’

Japp said slowly and forcefully:

‘What gave you the idea that the body wasn’t Miss Sainsbury Seale’s body?’

Poirot looked worried. He said:

‘It was the face that worried me. Why smash up a dead woman’s face?’

Japp said:

‘My word, I hope old Morley’s somewhere where he can know about it. It’s just possible, you know, that he was put out of the way on purpose—so that he couldn’t give evidence.’

‘It would certainly be better if he could have given evidence himself.’

‘Leatheran will be all right. Morley’s successor. He’s a thoroughly capable man with a good manner and the evidence is unmistakable.’

The evening papers came out with a sensation the next day. The dead body found in the Battersea flat, believed to be that of Miss Sainsbury Seale, was positively identified as that of Mrs Albert Chapman. Mr Leatheran, of 58, Queen Charlotte Street, unhesitatingly pronounced it to be Mrs Chapman on the evidence of the teeth and jaw, full particulars of which were recorded in the late Mr Morley’s professional chart.

Miss Sainsbury Seale’s clothes had been found on the body and Miss Sainsbury Seale’s handbag with the body—but where was Miss Sainsbury Seale herself?

Nine, Ten,

a Good Fat Hen

I

As they came away from the inquest Japp said jubilantly to Poirot:

‘A smart piece of work, that. Gave ’em a sensation!’

Poirot nodded.

‘You tumbled to it first,’ said Japp, ‘but, you know, I wasn’t happy about that body myself. After all, you don’t go smashing a dead person’s face and head about for nothing. It’s messy, unpleasant work, and it was pretty plain there must be some reason for it. And there’s only one reason there could be—to confuse the identity.’ He added generously: ‘But I shouldn’t have tumbled so quickly to the fact that it actually was the other woman.’

Poirot said with a smile:

‘And yet, my friend, the actual descriptions of the women were not unlike as regards fundamentals. Mrs Chapman was a smart, good-looking woman, well made up and fashionably turned out. Miss Sainsbury Seale was dowdy and innocent of lipstick or rouge. But the essentials were the same. Both were women of forty odd. Both were roughly about the same height and build. Both had hair turning grey which they touched up to make it appear golden.’

‘Yes, of course, when you put it like that. One thing we’ve got to admit—the fair Mabelle put it over on both of us, good and proper. I’d have sworn she was the genuine article.’

‘But, my friend, she was the genuine article. We know all about her past life.’

‘We didn’t know she was capable of murder—and that’s what it looks like now. Sylvia didn’t murder Mabelle. Mabelle murdered Sylvia.’

Hercule Poirot shook his head in a worried fashion. He still found it difficult to reconcile Mabelle Sainsbury Seale with murder. Yet in his ears he heard the small, ironic voice of Mr Barnes:

‘Look among the respectable people...’

Mabelle Sainsbury Seale had been eminently respectable.

Japp said with emphasis:

‘I’m going to get to the bottom of this case, Poirot. That woman isn’t going to put it over on me.’

II

The following day, Japp rang up. His voice held a curious note.

He said:

‘Poirot, do you want to hear a piece of news? It’s Na Poo, my lad. Na Poo!’

‘Pardon?—the line is perhaps not very clear. I did not quite catch—’

‘It’s off, my boy. O.F.F. Call it a day! Sit down and twiddle our thumbs!’

There was no mistaking the bitterness now. Poirot was startled.

‘What is off?’

‘The whole ruddy blinking thing! The hue and cry! The publicity! The whole bag of tricks!’

‘But I still do not understand.’

'Well, listen. Listen carefully, because I can't mention names very well. You know our inquiry? You know we're combing the country for a performing fish?'

'Yes, yes, perfectly. I comprehend now.'

'Well, that's been called off. Hushed up—kept mum. Now do you understand?'

'Yes, yes. But why?'

'Orders from the ruddy Foreign Office.'

'Is not that very extraordinary?'

'Well, it does happen now and again.'

'Why should they be so forbearing to Miss—to the performing fish?'

'They're not. They don't care tuppence about her. It's the publicity—if she's brought to trial too much might come out about Mrs A. C. The corpse. That's the hush-hush side! I can only suppose that the ruddy husband—Mr A. C.—Get me?'

'Yes, yes.'

'That he's somewhere abroad in a ticklish spot and they don't want to queer his pitch.'

'Tchah!'

'What did you say?'

'I made, mon ami, an exclamation of annoyance!'

'Oh! that was it. I thought you'd caught cold. Annoyance is right! I could use a stronger word. Letting that dame get away with it makes me see red.'

Poirot said very softly:

'She will not get away with it.'

'Our hands are tied, I tell you!'

'Yours may be—mine are not!'

'Good old Poirot! Then you are going on with it?'

'Mais oui—to the death.'

'Well, don't let it be your death, old boy! If this business goes on as it has begun someone will probably send you a poisoned tarantula by post!'

As he replaced the receiver, Poirot said to himself:

'Now, why did I use that melodramatic phrase—"to the death"? Vraiment, it is absurd!'

III

The letter came by evening post. It was typewritten except for the signature. Dear M. Poirot (it ran),

I should be greatly obliged if you would call upon me some time tomorrow. I may have a commission for you. I suggest twelve-thirty, at my house in Chelsea. If this is inconvenient to you, perhaps you would telephone my secretary? I apologize for giving you such short notice. Yours sincerely,

Alistair Blunt.

Poirot smoothed out the letter and read it a second time. At that moment the telephone rang. Hercule Poirot occasionally indulged in the fancy that he knew by the ring of his telephone bell what kind of message was impending.

On this occasion he was at once quite sure that the call was significant. It was not a wrong number—not one of his friends.

He got up and took down the receiver. He said in his polite, foreign voice:

‘ ‘Allo?’

An impersonal voice said: ‘What number are you, please?’

‘This is Whitehall 7272.’

There was a pause, a click, and then a voice spoke. It was a woman’s voice.

‘M. Poirot?’

‘Yes.’

‘M. Hercule Poirot?’

‘Yes.’

‘M. Poirot, you have either already received—or will shortly receive, a letter.’

‘Who is speaking?’

‘It is not necessary that you should know.’

‘Very well. I have received, Madame, eight letters and three bills by the evening post.’

‘Then you know which letter I mean. You will be wise, M. Poirot, to refuse the commission you have been offered.’

‘That, Madame, is a matter I shall decide myself.’

The voice said coldly:

‘I am warning you, M. Poirot. Your interference will no longer be tolerated. Keep out of this business.’

‘And if I do not keep out of it?’

‘Then we shall take steps to see that your interference is no longer to be feared...’

‘That is a threat, Madame!’

‘We are only asking you to be sensible...It is for your own good.’

‘You are very magnanimous!’

‘You cannot alter the course of events and what has been arranged. So keep out of what doesn’t concern you! Do you understand?’

‘Oh yes, I understand. But I consider that Mr Morley’s death is my concern.’

The woman’s voice said sharply:

‘Morley’s death was only an incident. He interfered with our plans.’

‘He was a human being, Madame, and he died before his time.’

‘He was of no importance.’

Poirot’s voice was dangerous as he said very quietly:

‘There you are wrong...’

‘It was his own fault. He refused to be sensible.’

‘I, too, refuse to be sensible.’

‘Then you are a fool.’

There was a click the other end as the receiver was replaced.

Poirot said, ‘Allo?’ then put down his receiver in turn. He did not trouble to ask the Exchange to trace the number. He was fairly sure that the call had been put through from a public telephone box. What intrigued and puzzled him was the fact that he thought he had heard the voice somewhere before. He racked his brains, trying to bring the elusive memory back. Could it be the voice of Miss Sainsbury Seale?

As he remembered it, Mabelle Sainsbury Seale’s voice had been high-pitched and somewhat affected, with rather overemphasized diction. This voice was not at all like that, and yet—perhaps it might be Miss Sainsbury Seale with her voice disguised. After all, she had been an actress in her time. She could alter her voice, probably, easily enough. In actual timbre, the voice was not unlike what he remembered. But he was not satisfied with that explanation. No, it was some other person that the voice brought back to him. It was not a voice he knew well—but he was still quite sure that he had heard it once, if not twice, before.

Why, he wondered, bother to ring up and threaten him? Could these people actually believe that threats would deter him? Apparently they did. It was poor psychology!

IV

There was some sensational news in the morning papers. The Prime Minister had been shot at when leaving 10, Downing Street with a friend yesterday evening. Fortunately the bullet had gone wide. The man, an Indian, had been taken into custody.

After reading this, Poirot took a taxi to Scotland Yard where he was shown up to Japp’s room. The latter greeted him heartily.

‘Ah, so the news has brought you along. Have any of the papers mentioned who “the friend” was with the P.M.?’

‘No, who was it?’

‘Alistair Blunt.’

‘Really?’

‘And,’ went on Japp, ‘we’ve every reason to believe that the bullet was meant for Blunt and not for the P.M. That is, unless the man was an even more thundering bad shot than he is already!’

‘Who did it?’

‘Some crazy Hindu student. Half baked, as usual. But he was put up to it. It wasn’t all his own idea.’

Japp added:

‘Quite a sound bit of work getting him. There’s usually a small group of people, you know, watching No. 10. When the shot was fired, a young American grabbed hold of a little man with a beard. He held on to him like grim death and yelled to the police that he’d got the man. Meanwhile the Indian was quietly hooking it—but one of our people nabbed him all right.’

‘Who was the American?’ asked Poirot curiously.

‘Young fellow by the name of Raikes. Why—’ He stopped short, staring at Poirot. ‘What’s the matter?’

Poirot said:

‘Howard Raikes, staying at the Holborn Palace Hotel?’

‘That’s right. Who—why, of course! I thought the name seemed familiar. He’s the patient who ran away that morning when Morley shot himself...’

He paused. He said slowly:

‘Rum—how that old business keeps cropping up. You’ve still got your ideas about it, haven’t you, Poirot?’

Hercule Poirot replied gravely:

‘Yes. I still have my ideas...’

V

At the Gothic House, Poirot was received by a secretary, a tall, limp young man with an accomplished social manner.

He was pleasantly apologetic.

‘I am so sorry, M. Poirot—and so is Mr Blunt. He has been called to Downing Street. The result of this—er—incident last night. I rang your flat, but unfortunately you had already left.’

The young man went on rapidly:

‘Mr Blunt commissioned me to ask you if it would be possible for you to spend the week-end with him at his house in Kent. Exsham, you know. If so, he would call for you in the car tomorrow evening.’

Poirot hesitated.

The young man said persuasively:

‘Mr Blunt is really most anxious to see you.’

Hercule Poirot bowed his head.

He said: ‘Thank you. I accept.’

‘Oh, that’s splendid. Mr Blunt will be delighted. If he calls for you about a quarter to six, will that—Oh, good morning, Mrs Olivera—’

Jane Olivera’s mother had just entered. She was very smartly dressed, with a hat clinging to an eyebrow in the midst of a very soignée coiffure.

‘Oh! Mr Selby, did Mr Blunt give you any instructions about those garden chairs? I meant to talk to him about them last night, because I knew we’d be going down this week-end and—’

Mrs Olivera took in Poirot and paused.

‘Do you know Mrs Olivera, M. Poirot?’

‘I have already had the pleasure of meeting Madame.’

Poirot bowed.

Mrs Olivera said vaguely:

‘Oh? How do you do. Of course, Mr Selby, I know that Alistair is a very busy man and that these small domestic matters mayn’t seem to him important—’

‘It’s quite all right, Mrs Olivera,’ said the efficient Mr Selby. ‘He told me about it and I rang up Messrs Deevers about them.’

‘Well, now, that’s a real load off my mind. Now, Mr Selby, can you tell me...’

Mrs Olivera clacked on. She was, thought Poirot, rather like a hen. A big, fat hen! Mrs Olivera, still clacking, moved majestically after her bust towards the door.

‘...And if you’re quite sure that there will only be ourselves this week-end—’

Mr Selby coughed.

‘Er—M. Poirot is also coming down for the week-end.’

Mrs Olivera stopped. She turned round and surveyed Poirot with visible distaste.

‘Is that really so?’

‘Mr Blunt has been kind enough to invite me,’ said Poirot.

‘Well, I wonder—why, if that isn’t queer of Alistair. You’ll excuse me, M. Poirot, but Mr Blunt particularly told me that he wanted a quiet, family week-end!’

Selby said firmly:

‘Mr Blunt is particularly anxious that M. Poirot should come.’

‘Oh really? He didn’t mention it to me.’

The door opened. Jane stood there. She said impatiently:

‘Mother, aren’t you coming? Our lunch appointment is at one-fifteen!’

‘I’m coming, Jane. Don’t be impatient.’

‘Well, get a move on, for goodness sake—Hallo, M. Poirot.’

She was suddenly very still—her petulance frozen. Her eyes more wary. Mrs Olivera said in a cold voice:

‘M. Poirot is coming down to Exsham for the week-end.’

‘Oh—I see.’

Jane Olivera stood back to let her mother pass her. On the point of following her, she whirled back again.

‘M. Poirot!’

Her voice was imperious.

Poirot crossed the room to her.

She said in a low voice: ‘You’re coming down to Exsham? Why?’

Poirot shrugged his shoulders. He said:

‘It is a kind thought of your uncle’s.’

Jane said:

‘But he can’t know...He can’t...When did he ask you? Oh, there’s no need—’

‘Jane!’

Her mother was calling from the hall.

Jane said in a low, urgent tone:

‘Stay away. Please don’t come.’

She went out. Poirot heard the sounds of altercation. Heard Mrs Olivera’s high, complaining, clucking voice. ‘I really will not tolerate your rudeness, Jane...I shall take steps to see that you do not interfere—’

The secretary said:

‘Then at a little before six tomorrow, M. Poirot?’

Poirot nodded assent mechanically. He was standing like a man who has seen a ghost. But it was his ears, not his eyes, that had given him the shock.

Two of the sentences that had drifted in through the open door were almost identical with those he had heard last night through the telephone, and he knew why the voice had been faintly familiar. As he walked out into the sunshine he shook his head blankly.

Mrs Olivera?

But it was impossible! It could not have been Mrs Olivera who had spoken over the ‘phone!

That empty-headed society woman—selfish, brainless, grasping, self-centred? What had he called her to himself just now?

‘That good fat hen? C’est ridicule!’ said Hercule Poirot.

His ears, he decided, must have deceived him. And yet—

VI

The Rolls called punctually for Poirot at a little before six.

Alistair Blunt and his secretary were the only occupants. Mrs Olivera and Jane had gone down in another car earlier, it seemed.

The drive was uneventful. Blunt talked a little, mostly of his garden and of a recent horticultural show. Poirot congratulated him on his escape from death, at which Blunt demurred. He said:

‘Oh, that! Don’t think the fellow was shooting at me particularly. Anyway, the poor chap hadn’t the first idea of how to aim! Just one of these half-crazed students. There’s no harm in them really. They just get worked up and fancy a pot shot at the P.M. will alter the course of history. It’s pathetic, really.’

‘There have been other attempts on your life, have there not?’

‘Sounds quite melodramatic,’ said Blunt, with a slight twinkle. ‘Someone sent me a bomb by post not long ago. It wasn’t a very efficient bomb. You know, these fellows who want to take on the management of the world—what sort of an efficient business do they think they could make of it, when they can’t even devise an effectual bomb?’

He shook his head.

‘It’s always the same thing—long-haired woolly idealists—without one practical bit of knowledge in their heads. I’m not a clever chap—never have been—but I can just read and write and do arithmetic. D’you understand what I mean by that?’

‘I think so, but explain to me further.’

‘Well, if I read something that is written down in English I can understand what it means—I am not talking of abstruse stuff, formulae or philosophy—just plain businesslike English—most people can’t! If I want to write down something I can write down what I mean—I’ve discovered that quite a lot of people can’t do that either! And, as I say, I can do plain arithmetic. If Jones has eight bananas and Brown takes ten away from him, how many will Jones have left? That’s the kind of sum people like to pretend has a simple answer. They won’t admit, first that Brown can’t do it—and second that there won’t be an answer in plus bananas!’

‘They prefer the answer to be a conjuring trick?’

‘Exactly. Politicians are just as bad. But I’ve always held out for plain common sense. You can’t beat it, you know, in the end.’

He added with a slightly self-conscious laugh:

‘But I mustn’t talk shop. Bad habit. Besides, I like to leave business matters behind when I get away from London. I’ve been looking forward, M. Poirot, to hearing a few of your adventures. I read a lot of thrillers and detective stories, you know. Do you think any of them are true to life?’

The conversation dwelt for the rest of the journey on the more spectacular cases of Hercule Poirot. Alistair Blunt displayed himself as vivid as any schoolboy for details. This pleasant atmosphere sustained a chill on arrival at Exsham, where behind her massive bust Mrs Olivera radiated a freezing disapproval. She ignored Poirot as far as possible, addressing herself exclusively to her host and to Mr Selby.

The latter showed Poirot to his room.

The house was a charming one, not very big, and furnished with the same quiet good taste that Poirot had noticed in London. Everything was costly but simple. The vast wealth that owned it was only indicated by the smoothness with which this apparent simplicity was produced. The service was admirable—the cooking English, not Continental—the wines at dinner stirred Poirot to a passion of appreciation. They had a perfect clear soup, a grilled sole, saddle of lamb with tiny young garden peas and strawberries and cream.

Poirot was so enjoying these creature comforts that the continued frigid demeanour of Mrs Olivera and the brusque rudeness of her daughter hardly attracted his attention. Jane, for some reason, was regarding him with definite hostility. Hazily, towards the end of the dinner, Poirot wondered why!

Looking down the table with mild curiosity, Blunt asked:

‘Helen not dining with us tonight?’

Julia Olivera's lips drew themselves in with a taut line. She said:

'Dear Helen has been over-tiring herself, I think, in the garden. I suggested it would be far better for her to go to bed and rest than to bother to dress herself up and come here. She quite saw my point.'

'Oh, I see.' Blunt looked vague and a little puzzled. 'I thought it made a bit of a change for her at week-ends.'

'Helen is such a simple soul. She likes turning in early,' said Mrs Olivera firmly. When Poirot joined the ladies in the drawing-room, Blunt having remained behind for a few minutes' conversation with his secretary, he heard Jane Olivera say to her mother:

'Uncle Alistair didn't like the cool way you'd shelved Helen Montessor, Mother.'

'Nonsense,' said Mrs Olivera robustly. 'Alistair is too good-natured. Poor relations are all very well—very kind of him to let her have the cottage rent free, but to think he has to have her up to the house every week-end for dinner is absurd! She's only a second cousin or something. I don't think Alistair ought to be imposed upon!'

'I think she's proud in her way,' said Jane. 'She does an awful lot in the garden.'

'That shows a proper spirit,' said Mrs Olivera comfortably. 'The Scotch are very independent and one respects them for it.'

She settled herself comfortably on the sofa and, still not taking any notice of Poirot, added:

'Just bring me the Low Down Review, dear. There's something about Lois Van Schuyler in it and that Moroccan guide of hers.'

Alistair Blunt appeared in the doorway. He said:

'Now M. Poirot, come into my room.'

Alistair Blunt's own sanctum was a low, long room at the back of the house, with windows opening upon the garden. It was comfortable, with deep armchairs and settees and just enough pleasant untidiness to make it livable.

(Needless to say, Hercule Poirot would have preferred a greater symmetry!) After offering his guest a cigarette and lighting his own pipe, Alistair Blunt came to the point quite simply and directly.

He said:

'There's a good deal that I'm not satisfied about. I'm referring, of course, to this Sainsbury Seale woman. For reasons of their own—reasons no doubt which are perfectly justified—the authorities have called off the hunt. I don't know exactly who Albert Chapman is or what he's doing—but whatever it is, it's something pretty vital and it's the sort of business that might land him in a tight spot. I don't know the ins and outs of it, but the P.M. did just mention that they can't afford any publicity whatever about this case and that the sooner it fades out of the public's memory the better.

'That's quite O.K. That's the official view, and they know what's necessary. So the police have got their hands tied.'

He leaned forward in his chair.

'But I want to know the truth, M. Poirot. And you're the man to find it out for me. You aren't hampered by officialdom.'

'What do you want me to do, M. Blunt?'

'I want you to find this woman—Sainsbury Seale.'

'Alive or dead?'

Alistair Blunt's eyebrows rose.

'You think it's possible that she is dead?'

Hercule Poirot was silent for a minute or two, then he said, speaking slowly and with weight:

'If you want my opinion—but it is only an opinion, remember—then, yes, I think she is dead...'

'Why do you think so?'

Hercule Poirot smiled slightly.

He said:

'It would not make sense to you if I said it was because of a pair of unworn stockings in a drawer.'

Alistair Blunt stared at him curiously.

'You're an odd man, M. Poirot.'

'I am very odd. That is to say, I am methodical, orderly and logical—and I do not like distorting facts to support a theory—that, I find—is unusual!'

Alistair Blunt said:

'I've been turning the whole thing over in my mind—it takes me a little time always to think a thing out. And the whole business is deuced odd! I mean—that dentist chap shooting himself, and then this Chapman woman packed away in her own fur chest with her face smashed in. It's nasty! It's damned nasty! I can't help feeling that there's something behind it all.'

Poirot nodded.

Blunt said:

'And you know—the more I think of it—I'm quite sure that woman never knew my wife. It was just a pretext to speak to me. But why? What good did it do her? I mean—bar a small subscription—and even that was made out to the society, not to her personally. And yet I do feel—that—that it was engineered—just meeting me on the steps of the house. It was all so pat. So suspiciously well-timed! But why? That's what I keep asking myself—why?'

'It is indeed the word—why? I too ask myself—and I cannot see it—no, I cannot see it.'

'You've no ideas at all on the subject?'

Poirot waved an exasperated hand.

'My ideas are childish in the extreme. I tell myself, it was perhaps a ruse to indicate you to someone—to point you out. But that again is absurd—you are quite a well-known man—and anyway how much more simple to say "See, that is he—the man who entered now by that door."'

'And anyway,' said Blunt, 'why should anyone want to point me out?'

'Mr Blunt, think back once more on your time that morning in the dentist's chair. Did nothing that Morley said strike an unusual note? Is there nothing at all that you can remember which might help as a clue?'

Alistair Blunt frowned in an effort of memory. Then he shook his head.

'I'm sorry. I can't think of anything.'

'You're quite sure he didn't mention this woman—this Miss Sainsbury Seale?'

‘No.’

‘Or the other woman—Mrs Chapman?’

‘No—no—we didn’t speak of people at all. We mentioned roses, gardens needing rain, holidays—nothing else.’

‘And no one came into the room while you were there?’

‘Let me see—no, I don’t think so. On other occasions I seem to remember a young woman being there—fair-haired girl. But she wasn’t there this time. Oh, another dentist fellow came in, I remember—the fellow with an Irish accent.’

‘What did he say or do?’

‘Just asked Morley some question and went out again. Morley was a bit short with him, I fancy. He was only there a minute or so.’

‘And there is nothing else you can remember? Nothing at all?’

‘No. He was absolutely normal.’

Hercule Poirot said thoughtfully:

‘I, too, found him absolutely normal.’

There was a long pause. Then Poirot said:

‘Do you happen to remember, Monsieur, a young man who was in the waiting-room downstairs with you that morning?’

Alistair Blunt frowned.

‘Let me see—yes, there was a young man—rather restless he was. I don’t remember him particularly, though. Why?’

‘Would you know him again if you saw him?’

Blunt shook his head.

‘I hardly glanced at him.’

‘He didn’t try to enter into conversation with you at all?’

‘No.’

Blunt looked with frank curiosity at the other.

‘What’s the point? Who is this young man?’

‘His name is Howard Raikes.’

Poirot watched keenly for any reaction, but he saw none.

‘Ought I to know his name? Have I met him elsewhere?’

‘I do not think you have met him. He is a friend of your niece, Miss Olivera’s.’

‘Oh, one of Jane’s friends.’

‘Her mother, I gather, does not approve of the friendship.’

Alistair Blunt said absently:

‘I don’t suppose that will cut any ice with Jane.’

‘So seriously does her mother regard the friendship that I gather she brought her daughter over from the States on purpose to get her away from this young man.’

‘Oh!’ Blunt’s face registered comprehension. ‘It’s that fellow, is it?’

‘Aha, you become more interested now.’

‘He’s a most undesirable young fellow in every way, I believe. Mixed up in a lot of subversive activities.’

‘I understand from Miss Olivera that he made an appointment that morning in Queen Charlotte Street, solely in order to get a look at you.’

‘To try and get me to approve of him?’

‘Well—no—I understand the idea was that he should be induced to approve of you.’

‘Well, of all the damned cheek!’

Poirot concealed a smile.

‘It appears you are everything that he most disapproves of.’

‘He’s certainly the kind of young man I disapprove of! Spends his time tub-thumping and talking hot air, instead of doing a decent job of work!’

Poirot was silent for a minute, then he said:

‘Will you forgive me if I ask you an impertinent and very personal question?’

‘Fire ahead.’

‘In the event of your death, what are your testamentary dispositions?’

Blunt stared. He said sharply:

‘Why do you want to know that?’

‘Because, it is just possible,’ he shrugged his shoulders—‘that it might be relevant to this case.’

‘Nonsense!’

‘Perhaps. But perhaps not.’

Alistair Blunt said coldly:

‘I think you are being unduly melodramatic, M. Poirot. Nobody has been trying to murder me—or anything like that!’

‘A bomb on your breakfast table—a shot in the street—’

‘Oh those! Any man who deals in the world’s finance in a big way is liable to that kind of attention from some crazy fanatic!’

'It might possibly be a case of someone who is not a fanatic and not crazy.'

Blunt stared.

'What are you driving at?'

'In plain language, I want to know who benefits by your death.'

Blunt grinned.

'Chiefly the St Edward's Hospital, the Cancer Hospital, and the Royal Institute for the Blind.'

'Ah!'

'In addition, I have left a sum of money to my niece by marriage, Mrs Julia Olivera; an equivalent sum, but in trust, to her daughter, Jane Olivera, and also a substantial provision for my only surviving relative, a second cousin, Helen Montessor, who was left very badly off and who occupies a small cottage on the estate here.'

He paused and then said:

'This, M. Poirot, is strictly in confidence.'

'Naturally, Monsieur, naturally.'

Alistair Blunt added sarcastically:

'I suppose you do not suggest, M. Poirot, that either Julia or Jane Olivera or my cousin Helen Montessor, are planning to murder me for my money?'

'I suggest nothing—nothing at all.'

Blunt's slight irritation subsided. He said:

'And you'll take on that other commission for me?'

'The finding of Miss Sainsbury Seale? Yes, I will.'

Alistair Blunt said heartily:

'Good man.'

VII

In leaving the room Poirot almost cannoned into a tall figure outside the door. He said: 'I beg your pardon, Mademoiselle.'

Jane Olivera drew apart a little.

She said. 'Do you know what I think of you, M. Poirot?'

'Eh bien—Mademoiselle—'

She did not give time to finish. The question, indeed, had but a rhetorical value. All that it meant was that Jane Olivera was about to answer it herself.

'You're a spy, that's what you are! A miserable, low, snooping spy, nosing round and making trouble!'

'I assure you, Mademoiselle—'

'I know just what you're after! And I know now just what lies you tell! Why don't you admit it straight out? Well, I'll tell you this—you won't find out anything—anything at all! There's nothing to find out! No one's going to harm a hair on my precious uncle's head. He's safe enough. He'll always be safe. Safe and smug and prosperous—and full of platitudes! He's just a stodgy John Bull, that's what he is—without an ounce of imagination or vision.'

She paused, then, her agreeable, husky voice deepening, she said venomously: 'I loathe the sight of you—you bloody little bourgeois detective!'

She swept away from him in a whirl of expensive model drapery.

Hercule Poirot remained, his eyes very wide open, his eyebrows raised and his hand thoughtfully caressing his moustaches.

The epithet bourgeois was, he admitted, well applied to him. His outlook on life was essentially bourgeois

, and always had been, but the employment of it as an epithet of contempt by the exquisitely turned Jane Olivera gave him, as he expressed it to himself, furiously to think. He went, still thinking, into the drawing room.

Mrs Olivera was playing patience.

She looked up as Poirot entered, surveyed him with the cold look she might have bestowed upon a black beetle and murmured distantly:

'Red knave on black queen.'

Chilled, Poirot retreated. He reflected mournfully:

'Alas, it would seem that nobody loves me!'

He strolled out of the window into the garden. It was an enchanting evening with a smell of night-scented stocks in the air. Poirot sniffed happily and strolled along a path that ran between two herbaceous borders.

He turned a corner and two dimly-seen figures sprang apart.

It would seem that he had interrupted a pair of lovers.

Poirot hastily turned and retraced his steps.

Even out here, it would seem, his presence was de trop.

He passed Alistair Blunt's window and Alistair Blunt was dictating to Mr Selby. There seemed definitely only one place for Hercule Poirot.

He went up to his bedroom.

He pondered for some time on various fantastic aspects of the situation. Had he or had he not made a mistake in believing the voice on the telephone to be that of Mrs Olivera?

Surely the idea was absurd!

He recalled the melodramatic revelations of quiet little Mr Barnes. He speculated on the mysterious whereabouts of Mr Q.X.912, alias Albert Chapman. He remembered, with a spasm of annoyance, the anxious look in the eyes of the maidservant, Agnes—

It was always the same way—people would keep things back! Usually quite unimportant things, but until they were cleared out of the way, impossible to pursue a straight path. At the moment the path was anything but straight!

And the most unaccountable obstacle in the way of clear thinking and orderly progress was what he described to himself as the contradictory and impossible problem of Miss Sainsbury Seale. For, if the facts that Hercule Poirot had observed were true facts—then nothing whatever made sense!

Hercule Poirot said to himself, with astonishment in the thought:

‘Is it possible that I am growing old?’

Eleven, Twelve,

Men must Delve

I

After passing a troubled night, Hercule Poirot was up and about early on the next day. The weather was perfect and he retraced his steps of last night.

The herbaceous borders were in full beauty and though Poirot himself leaned to a more orderly type of flower arrangement—a neat arrangement of beds of scarlet geraniums such as are seen at Ostend—he nevertheless realized that here was the perfection of the English garden spirit. He pursued his way through a rose garden, where the neat lay-out of the beds delighted him—and through the winding ways of an alpine rock garden, coming at last to the walled kitchen gardens. Here he observed a sturdy woman clad in a tweed coat and skirt, black browed, with short cropped black hair who was talking in a slow, emphatic Scots voice to what was evidently the head gardener. The head gardener, Poirot observed, did not appear to be enjoying the conversation. A sarcastic inflection made itself heard in Miss Helen Montessor’s voice, and Poirot escaped nimbly down a side path.

A gardener who had been, Poirot shrewdly suspected, resting on his spade, began digging with fervour. Poirot approached nearer. The man, a young fellow, dug with ardour, his back to Poirot who paused to observe him.

‘Good-morning,’ said Poirot amiably.

A muttered ‘Morning, sir,’ was the response, but the man did not stop working. Poirot was a little surprised. In his experience a gardener, though anxious to appear zealously at work as you approached, was usually only too willing to pause and pass the time of day when directly addressed. It seemed, he thought, a little unnatural. He stood there for some minutes, watching the toiling figure. Was there, or was there not, something a little familiar about the turn of those shoulders? Or could it be, thought Hercule Poirot, that he was getting into a habit of thinking that both voices and shoulders were familiar when they were really nothing of the kind? Was he, as he had feared last night, growing old?

He passed thoughtfully onward out of the walled garden and paused to regard a rising slope of shrubbery outside.

Presently, like some fantastic moon, a round object rose gently over the top of the kitchen garden wall. It was the egg-shaped head of Hercule Poirot, and the eyes of Hercule Poirot regarded with a good deal of interest the face of the young gardener who had now stopped digging and was passing a sleeve across his wet face.

‘Very curious and very interesting,’ murmured Hercule Poirot as he discreetly lowered his head once more.

He emerged from the shrubbery and brushed off some twigs and leaves that were spoiling the neatness of his apparel.

Yes, indeed, very curious and interesting that Frank Carter, who had a secretarial job in the country, should be working as a gardener in the employment of Alistair Blunt. Reflecting on these points, Hercule Poirot heard a gong in the distance and retraced his steps towards the house.

On the way there he encountered his host talking to Miss Montessor who had just emerged from the kitchen garden by the farther door.

Her voice rose clear and distinct:

‘It’s verra kind of you, Alistairr, but I would preferr not to accept any invitations this week while your American relations are with you!’

Blunt said:

‘Julia’s rather a tactless woman, but she doesn’t mean—’

Miss Montessor said calmly:

‘In my opinion her manner to me is verra insolent, and I will not put up with insolence—from American women or any others!’

Miss Montessor moved away, Poirot came up to find Alistair Blunt looking as sheepish as most men look who are having trouble with their female relations. He said ruefully:

‘Women really are the devil! Good-morning, M. Poirot. Lovely day, isn’t it?’

They turned towards the house and Blunt said with a sigh: ‘I do miss my wife!’

In the dining-room, he remarked to the redoubtable Julia:

‘I’m afraid, Julia, you’ve rather hurt Helen’s feelings.’

Mrs Olivera said grimly:

‘The Scotch are always touchy.’

Alistair Blunt looked unhappy.

Hercule Poirot said:

‘You have a young gardener, I noticed, whom I think you must have taken on recently.’

‘I dare say,’ said Blunt. ‘Yes, Burton, my third gardener, left about three weeks ago, and we took this fellow on instead.’

‘Do you remember where he came from?’

‘I really don’t. MacAlister engaged him. Somebody or other asked me to give him a trial, I think. Recommended him warmly. I’m rather surprised, because MacAlister says he isn’t much good. He wants to sack him again.’

‘What is his name?’

‘Dunning—Sunbury—something like that.’

‘Would it be a great impertinence to ask what you pay him?’

‘Not at all. Two pounds fifteen, I think it is.’

‘Not more?’

‘Certainly not more—might be a bit less.’

‘Now that,’ said Poirot, ‘is very curious.’

Alistair Blunt looked at him inquiringly.

But Jane Olivera, rustling the paper, distracted the conversation.

‘A lot of people seem to be out for your blood, Uncle Alistair!’

‘Oh, you’re reading the debate in the House. That’s all right. Only Archerton—he’s always tilting at windmills. And he’s got the most crazy ideas of finance. If we let him have his way, England would be bankrupt in a week.’

Jane said:

‘Don’t you ever want to try anything new?’

‘Not unless it’s an improvement to the old, my dear.’

‘But you’d never think it would be. You’d always say, “This would never work”—without even trying.’

‘Experimentalists can do a lot of harm.’

‘Yes, but how can you be satisfied with things as they are? All the waste and the inequality and the unfairness. Something must be done about it!’

‘We get along pretty well in this country, Jane, all things considered.’

Jane said passionately:

‘What’s needed is a new heaven and a new earth! And you sit there eating kidneys!’

She got up and went out by the french window into the garden.

Alistair looked mildly surprised and a little uncomfortable.

He said: ‘Jane has changed a lot lately. Where does she get all these ideas?’

‘Take no notice of what Jane says,’ said Mrs Olivera. ‘Jane’s a very silly girl. You know what girls are—they go to these queer parties in studios where the young men have funny ties and they come home and talk a lot of nonsense.’

‘Yes, but Jane was always rather a hard-boiled young woman.’

‘It’s just a fashion, Alistair, these things are in the air!’

Alistair Blunt said:

‘Yes, they’re in the air all right.’

He looked a little worried.

Mrs Olivera rose and Poirot opened the door for her. She swept out frowning to herself. Alistair Blunt said suddenly:

‘I don’t like it, you know! Everybody’s talking this sort of stuff! And it doesn’t mean anything! It’s all hot air! I find myself up against it the whole time—a new heaven and a new earth. What does it mean?’

‘They can’t tell you themselves! They’re just drunk on words.’

He smiled suddenly, rather ruefully.

‘I’m one of the last of the Old Guard, you know.’

Poirot said curiously:

‘If you were—removed, what would happen?’

‘Removed! What a way of putting it!’ His face grew suddenly grave. ‘I’ll tell you. A lot of damned fools would try a lot of very costly experiments. And that would be the end of stability—of common sense, of solvency. In fact, of this England of ours as we know it...’

Poirot nodded his head. He was essentially in sympathy with the banker. He, too, approved of solvency. And he began to realize with a new meaning just exactly what Alistair Blunt stood for. Mr Barnes had told him, but he had hardly taken it in then. Quite suddenly, he was afraid...

II

'I've finished my letters,' said Blunt, appearing later in the morning. 'Now, M. Poirot, I'm going to show you my garden.'

The two men went out together and Blunt talked eagerly of his hobby. The rock garden, with its rare alpine plants, was his greatest joy and they spent some time there while Blunt pointed out certain minute and rare species.

Hercule Poirot, his feet encased in his best patent leather shoes, listened patiently, shifting his weight tenderly from one foot to the other and wincing slightly as the heat of the sun caused the illusion that his feet were gigantic puddings!

His host strolled on, pointing out various plants in the wide border. Bees were humming and from near at hand came the monotonous clicking of a pair of shears trimming a laurel hedge. It was all very drowsy and peaceful.

Blunt paused at the end of the border, looking back. The clip of the shears was quite close by, though the clipper was concealed from view.

'Look at the vista down from here, Poirot. The Sweet Williams are particularly fine this year. I don't know when I've seen them so good—and those are Russell lupins. Marvellous colours.'

Crack! The shot broke the peace of the morning. Something sang angrily through the air. Alistair Blunt turned bewildered to where a faint thread of smoke was rising from the middle of the laurels. There was a sudden outcry of angry voices, the laurels heaved as two men struggled together. A high-pitched American voice sang out resolutely:

'I've got you, you damned scoundrel! Drop that gun!'

Two men struggled out into the open. The young gardener who had dug so industriously that morning was writhing in the powerful grip of a man nearly a head taller.

Poirot recognized the latter at once. He had already guessed from the voice. Frank Carter snarled:

'Let go of me! It wasn't me, I tell you! I never did.'

Howard Raikes said:

'Oh, no? Just shooting at the birds, I suppose!'

He stopped—looking at the newcomers.

'Mr Alistair Blunt? This guy here has just taken a pot-shot at you. I caught him right in the act.'

Frank Carter cried out:

'It's a lie! I was clipping the hedge. I heard a shot and the gun fell right here at my feet. I picked it up—that's only natural, that is, and then this bloke jumped on me.'

Howard Raikes said grimly:

'The gun was in your hand and it had just been fired!'

With a final gesture, he tossed the pistol to Poirot.

'Let's see what the dick's got to say about it! Lucky I got hold of you in time. I guess there are several more shots in that automatic of yours.'

Poirot murmured:

‘Precisely.’

Blunt was frowning angrily. He said sharply:

‘Now then Dunnon—Dunbury—what’s your name?’

Hercule Poirot interrupted. He said:

‘This man’s name is Frank Carter.’

Carter turned on him furiously.

‘You’ve had it in for me all along! You came spying on me that Sunday. I tell you, it’s not true. I never shot at him.’

Hercule Poirot said gently:

‘Then, in that case, who did?’

He added:

‘There is no one else here but ourselves, you see.’

III

Jane Olivera came running along the path. Her hair streamlined back behind her. Her eyes were wide with fear. She gasped: ‘Howard?’

Howard Raikes said lightly:

‘Hallo, Jane. I’ve just been saving your uncle’s life.’

‘Oh!’ She stopped. ‘You have?’

‘Your arrival certainly seems to have been very opportune, Mr—er—’ Blunt hesitated.

‘This is Howard Raikes, Uncle Alistair. He’s a friend of mine.’

Blunt looked at Raikes—he smiled.

‘Oh!’ he said. ‘So you are Jane’s young man! I must thank you.’

With a puffing noise as of a steam engine at high pressure Julia Olivera appeared on the scene. She panted out:

‘I heard a shot. Is Alistair—Why—’ She stared blankly at Howard Raikes. ‘You? Why, why, how dare you?’

Jane said in an icy voice:

‘Howard has just saved Uncle Alistair’s life, mother.’

‘What? I—I—’

‘This man tried to shoot Uncle Alistair and Howard grabbed him and took the pistol away from him.’

Frank Carter said violently:

‘You’re bloody liars, all of you.’

Mrs Olivera, her jaw dropping, said blankly:

'Oh!' It took her a minute or two to readjust her poise. She turned first to Blunt.

'My dear Alistair! How awful! Thank God you're safe. But it must have been a frightful shock. I—I feel quite faint myself. I wonder—do you think I could have just a little brandy?'

Blunt said quickly:

'Of course. Come back to the house.'

She took his arm, leaning on it heavily.

Blunt looked over his shoulder at Poirot and Howard Raikes.

'Can you bring that fellow along?' he asked. 'We'll ring up the police and hand him over.'

Frank Carter opened his mouth, but no words came. He was dead white, and his knees were wilting. Howard Raikes hauled him along with an unsympathetic hand.

'Come on, you,' he said.

Frank Carter murmured hoarsely and unconvincingly:

'It's all a lie...'

Howard Raikes looked at Poirot.

'You've got precious little to say for yourself for a high-toned sleuth! Why don't you throw your weight about a bit?'

'I am reflecting, Mr Raikes.'

'I guess you'll need to reflect! I should say you'll lose your job over this! It isn't thanks to you that Alistair Blunt is still alive at this minute.'

'This is your second good deed of the kind, is it not, Mr Raikes?'

'What the hell do you mean?'

'It was only yesterday, was it not, that you caught and held the man whom you believed to have shot at Mr Blunt and the Prime Minister?'

Howard Raikes said:

'Er—yes. I seem to be making a kind of habit of it.'

'But there is a difference,' Hercule Poirot pointed out. 'Yesterday, the man you caught and held was not the man who fired the shot in question. You made a mistake.'

Frank Carter said sullenly:

'He's made a mistake now.'

'Quiet, you,' said Raikes.

Hercule Poirot murmured to himself:

'I wonder...'

IV

Dressing for dinner, adjusting his tie to an exact symmetry, Hercule Poirot frowned at his reflection in the mirror.

He was dissatisfied—but he would have been at a loss to explain why. For the case, as he owned to himself, was so very clear. Frank Carter had indeed been caught red-handed. It was not as though he had any particular belief in, or liking for, Frank Carter. Carter, he thought dispassionately, was definitely what the English call a ‘wrong ’un’. He was an unpleasant young bully of the kind that appeals to women, so that they are reluctant to believe the worst, however plain the evidence.

And Carter’s whole story was weak in the extreme. This tale of having been approached by agents of the ‘Secret Service’—and offered a plummy job. To take the post of gardener and report on the conversations and actions of the other gardeners. It was a story that was disproved easily enough—there was no foundation for it.

A particularly weak invention—the kind of thing, Poirot reflected, that a man like Carter would invent. And on Carter’s side, there was nothing at all to be said. He could offer no explanation, except that somebody else must have shot off the revolver. He kept repeating that. It was a frame-up. No, there was nothing to be said for Carter except, perhaps, that it seemed an odd coincidence that Howard Raikes should have been present two days running at the moment when a bullet had just missed Alistair Blunt.

But presumably there wasn’t anything in that. Raikes certainly hadn’t fired the shot in Downing Street. And his presence down here was fully accounted for—he had come down to be near his girl. No, there was nothing definitely improbable in his story.

It had turned out, of course, very fortunately for Howard Raikes. When a man has just saved you from a bullet, you cannot forbid him the house. The least you can do is to show friendliness and extend hospitality. Mrs Olivera didn’t like it, obviously, but even she saw that there was nothing to be done about it.

Jane’s undesirable young man had got his foot in and he meant to keep it there!

Poirot watched him speculatively during the evening.

He was playing his part with a good deal of astuteness. He did not air any subversive views, he kept off politics. He told amusing stories of his hitch-hikes and tramps in wild places.

‘He is no longer the wolf,’ thought Poirot. ‘No, he has put on the sheep’s clothing. But underneath? I wonder...’

As Poirot was preparing for bed that night, there was a rap on the door. Poirot called, ‘Come in,’ and Howard Raikes entered.

He laughed at Poirot’s expression.

‘Surprised to see me? I’ve had my eye on you all evening. I didn’t like the way you were looking. Kind of thoughtful.’

‘Why should that worry you, my friend?’

‘I don’t know why, but it did. I thought maybe that you were finding certain things just a bit hard to swallow.’

‘Eh bien? And if so?’

‘Well, I decided that I’d best come clean. About yesterday, I mean. That was a fake show all right! You see, I was watching his lordship come out of 10, Downing Street and I saw Ram Lal fire at him. I know Ram Lal. He’s a nice kid. A bit excitable but he feels the wrongs of India very keenly. Well, there was no harm done, that precious pair of stuffed shirts weren’t harmed—the bullet had missed ’em both by miles—so I decided to put up a show and hope the Indian kid would get clear. I grabbed hold of a shabby little guy just by me and called out that I’d got the villain and hoped Ram Lal was beating it all right. But the dicks were too smart. They were on to him in a flash. That’s just how it was. See?’

Hercule Poirot said:

‘And today?’

‘That’s different. There weren’t any Ram Lals about today. Carter was the only man on the spot. He fired that pistol all right! It was still in his hand when I jumped on him. He was going to try a second shot, I expect.’

Poirot said:

‘You were very anxious to preserve the safety of M. Blunt?’

Raikes grinned—an engaging grin.

‘A bit odd, you think, after all I’ve said? Oh, I admit it. I think Blunt is a guy who ought to be shot—for the sake of Progress and Humanity—I don’t mean personally—he’s a nice enough old boy in his British way. I think that, and yet when I saw someone taking a pot-shot at him I leap in and interfere. That shows you how illogical the human animal is. It’s crazy, isn’t it?’

‘The gap between theory and practice is a wide one.’

‘I’ll say it is!’ Mr Raikes got up from the bed where he had been sitting. His smile was easy and confiding.

‘I just thought,’ he said, ‘that I’d come along and explain the thing to you.’

He went out shutting the door carefully behind him.

V

‘Deliver me, O Lord, from the evil man: and preserve me from the wicked man,’ sang Mrs Olivera in a firm voice, slightly off the note.

There was a relentlessness about her enunciation of the sentiment which made Hercule Poirot deduce that Mr Howard Raikes was the wicked man immediately in her mind. Hercule Poirot had accompanied his host and the family to the morning service in the village church. Howard Raikes had said with a faint sneer: ‘So you always go to church, Mr Blunt?’

And Alistair had murmured vaguely something about it being expected of you in the country—can’t let the parson down, you know—which typically English sentiment had merely bewildered the young man, and had made Hercule Poirot smile comprehendingly.

Mrs Olivera had tactfully accompanied her host and commanded Jane to do likewise.

‘They have sharpened their tongues like a serpent,’ sang the choir boys in shrill treble, ‘adder’s poison is under their lips.’

The tenors and basses demanded with gusto:

‘Keep me, O Lord, from the hands of the ungodly. Preserve me from the wicked men who are purposed to overthrow my goings.’

Hercule Poirot essayed in a hesitant baritone.

‘The proud have laid a snare for me,’ he sang, ‘and spread a net with cords: yea, and set traps in my way...’

His mouth remained open.

He saw it—saw clearly the trap into which he had so nearly fallen!

Like a man in a trance Hercule Poirot remained, mouth open, staring into space. He remained there as the congregation seated themselves with a rustle; until Jane Olivera tugged at his arm and murmured a sharp, ‘Sit down.’

Hercule Poirot sat down. An aged clergyman with a beard intoned: 'Here beginneth the fifteenth chapter of the First Book of Samuel,' and began to read.

But Poirot heard nothing of the smiting of the Amalekites.

A snare cunningly laid—a net with cords—a pit open at his feet—dug carefully so that he should fall into it.

He was in a daze—a glorious daze where isolated facts spun wildly round before settling neatly into their appointed places.

It was like a kaleidoscope—shoe buckles, 10-inch stockings, a damaged face, the low tastes in literature of Alfred the page-boy, the activities of Mr Amberiotis, and the part played by the late Mr Morley, all rose up and whirled and settled themselves down into a coherent pattern. For the first time, Hercule Poirot was looking at the casethe right way up .

'For rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft and stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry. Because thou hast rejected the word of the Lord he hath also rejected thee from being king. Here endeth the first lesson,' quavered the aged clergyman all in one breath.

As one in a dream, Hercule Poirot rose to praise the Lord in the Te Deum. Thirteen, Fourteen,

Maids are Courting

I

'M. Reilly, is it not?'

The young Irishman started as the voice spoke at his elbow.

He turned.

Standing next to him at the counter of the Shipping Co. was a small man with large moustaches and an egg-shaped head.

'You do not remember me, perhaps?'

'You do yourself an injustice, M. Poirot. You're not a man that's easily forgotten.'

He turned back to speak to the clerk behind the counter who was waiting. The voice at his elbow murmured:

'You are going abroad for a holiday?'

'It's not a holiday I'm taking. And you yourself, M. Poirot? You're not turning your back on this country, I hope?'

'Sometimes,' said Hercule Poirot, 'I return for a short while to my own country—Belgium.'

'I'm going farther than that,' said Reilly. 'It's America for me.' He added: 'And I don't think I'll be coming back, either.'

'I'm sorry to hear that, Mr Reilly. You are, then, abandoning your practice in Queen Charlotte Street.'

'If you'd say it was abandoning me, you'd be nearer the mark.'

'Indeed? That is very sad.'

'It doesn't worry me. When I think of the debts I shall leave behind me unpaid, I'm a happy man.'

He grinned engagingly.

'It's not I who'll be shooting myself because of money troubles. Leave them behind you, I say, and start afresh. I've got my qualifications and they're good ones if I say so myself.'

Poirot murmured:

'I saw Miss Morley the other day.'

'Was that a pleasure to you? I'd say it was not. A more sour-faced woman never lived. I've often wondered what she'd be like drunk—but that's what no one will ever know.'

Poirot said:

'Did you agree with the verdict of the Coroner's Court on your partner's death?'

'I did not,' said Reilly emphatically.

'You don't think he made a mistake in the injection?'

Reilly said:

'If Morley injected that Greek with the amount that they say he did, he was either drunk or else he meant to kill the man. And I've never seen Morley drink.'

'So you think it was deliberate?'

'I'd not like to be saying that. It's a grave accusation to be making. Truly now, I don't believe it.'

'There must be some explanation.'

'There must indeed—but I've not thought of it yet.'

Poirot said:

'When did you last actually see Mr Morley alive?'

'Let me see now. It's a long time after to be asking me a thing like that. It would be the night before—about a quarter to seven.'

'You didn't see him on the actual day of the murder?'

Reilly shook his head.

'You are sure?' Poirot persisted.

'Oh, I'd not say that. But I don't remember—'

'You did not, for instance, go up to his room about eleven-thirty-five when he had a patient there?'

'You're right now. I did. There was a technical question I had to ask him about some instruments I was ordering. They'd rung me up about it. But I was only there for a minute, so it slipped my memory. He had a patient there at the time.'

Poirot nodded. He said:

'There is another question I always meant to ask you. Your patient, Mr Raikes, cancelled his appointment by walking out. What did you do during that half-hour's leisure?'

'What I always do when I have any leisure. Mixed myself a drink. And as I've been telling you, I put through a telephone call and ran up to see Morley for a minute.'

Poirot said:

‘And I also understand that you had no patient from half-past twelve to one after Mr Barnes left. When did he leave, by the way?’

‘Oh! Just after half-past twelve.’

‘And what did you do then?’

‘The same as before. Mixed myself another drink!’

‘And went up to see Morley again?’

Mr Reilly smiled.

‘Are you meaning did I go up and shoot him? I’ve told you already, long ago, that I did not. But you’ve only my word for it.’

Poirot said:

‘What did you think of the house-parlourmaid, Agnes?’

Reilly stared:

‘Now that’s a funny question to be asking.’

‘But I should like to know.’

‘I’ll answer you. I didn’t think about her. Georgina kept a strict eye on the maids—and quite right too. The girl never looked my way once—which was bad taste on her part.’

‘I have a feeling,’ said Hercule Poirot, ‘that that girl knows something.’

He looked inquiringly at Mr Reilly. The latter smiled and shook his head.

‘Don’t ask me,’ he said. ‘I know nothing about it. I can’t help you at all.’

He gathered up the tickets which were lying in front of him and went off with a nod and a smile. Poirot explained to a disillusioned clerk that he would not make up his mind about that cruise to the Northern Capitals after all.

II

Poirot paid another visit to Hampstead. Mrs Adams was a little surprised, perhaps, to see him. Though he had been vouched for, so to speak, by a Chief Inspector of Scotland Yard, she nevertheless regarded him as a ‘quaint little foreigner’ and had not taken his pretensions very seriously. She was, however, very willing to talk.

After the first sensational announcement about the identity of the victim, the finding of the inquest had received very little publicity. It had been a case of mistaken identity—the body of Mrs Chapman had been mistaken for that of Miss Sainsbury Seale. That was all that the public knew. The fact that Miss Sainsbury Seale had been probably the last person to see the unfortunate Mrs Chapman alive was not stressed. There had been no hint in the Press that Miss Sainsbury Seale might possibly be wanted by the police on a criminal charge.

Mrs Adams had been very relieved when she knew that it was not her friend’s body which had been discovered so dramatically. She appeared to have no idea that any suspicion might attach to Mabelle Sainsbury Seale.

‘But it is so extraordinary that she has disappeared like this. I feel sure, M. Poirot, that it must be loss of memory.’

Poirot said that it was very probable. He had known cases of the kind.

‘Yes—I remember a friend of one of my cousins. She’d had a lot of nursing and worry, and it brought it on. Amnesia, I think they called it.’

Poirot said that he believed that that was the technical term.

He paused and then asked if Mrs Adams had ever heard Miss Sainsbury Seale speak of a Mrs Albert Chapman?

No, Mrs Adams never remembered her friend mentioning anyone of that name. But then, of course, it wasn’t likely that Miss Sainsbury Seale should happen to mention everyone with whom she was acquainted. Who was this Mrs Chapman? Had the police any idea who could have murdered her?

‘It is still a mystery, Madame.’ Poirot shook his head and then asked if it was Mrs Adams who had recommended Mr Morley as a dentist to Miss Sainsbury Seale.

Mrs Adams replied in the negative. She herself went to a Mr French in Harley Street, and if Mabelle had asked her about a dentist she would have sent her to him.

Possibly, Poirot thought, it might have been this Mrs Chapman who recommended Miss Sainsbury Seale to go to Mr Morley.

Mrs Adams agreed that it might have been. Didn’t they know at the dentist’s?

But Poirot had already asked Miss Nevill that question and Miss Nevill had not known or had not remembered. She recollected Mrs Chapman, but did not think the latter had ever mentioned a Miss Sainsbury Seale—the name being an odd one, she would have remembered it had she heard it then. Poirot persevered with his questions.

Mrs Adams had known Miss Sainsbury Seale first in India, had she not? Mrs Adams agreed. Did Mrs Adams know if Miss Sainsbury Seale had met Mr or Mrs Alistair Blunt at any time out there?

‘Oh, I don’t think so, M. Poirot. You mean the big banker? They were out some years ago staying with the Viceroy, but I’m sure if Mabelle had met them at all, she would have talked about it or mentioned them.’

‘I’m afraid,’ added Mrs Adams, with a faint smile, ‘one does usually mention the important people. We’re all such snobs at heart.’

‘She never did mention the Blunts—Mrs Blunt in particular?’

‘Never.’

‘If she had been a close friend of Mrs Blunt’s probably you would have known?’

‘Oh yes. I don’t believe she knew anyone like that. Mabelle’s friends were all very ordinary people—like us.’

‘That, Madame, I cannot allow,’ said Poirot gallantly.

Mrs Adams went on talking of Mabelle Sainsbury Seale as one talks of a friend who has recently died. She recalled all Mabelle’s good works, her kindnesses, her indefatigable work for the mission, her zeal, her earnestness.

Hercule Poirot listened. As Japp had said, Mabelle Sainsbury Seale was a real person. She had lived in Calcutta and taught elocution and worked amongst the native population. She had been respectable, well meaning, a little fussy and stupid perhaps, but also what is termed a woman with a heart of gold. And Mrs Adams’ voice ran on: ‘She was so much in earnest over everything, M. Poirot. And she found people so apathetic—so hard to rouse. It was very difficult to get subscriptions out of people—worse every year, with the income tax rising and the cost of living and everything. She said to me once: “When one knows what money can do—the wonderful good you can accomplish with it—well, really sometimes, Alice, I feel I would commit acrimie to get it.” That shows, doesn’t it, M. Poirot, how strongly she felt?’

‘She said that, did she?’ said Poirot thoughtfully.

He asked, casually, when Miss Sainsbury Seale had enunciated this particular statement, and learned that it had been about three months ago.

He left the house and walked away lost in thought.

He was considering the character of Mabelle Sainsbury Seale.

A nice woman—an earnest and kindly woman—a respectable, decent type of woman. It was amongst that type of person that Mr Barnes had suggested a potential criminal could be found. She had travelled back on the same boat from India as Mr Amberiotis. There seemed reason to believe that she had lunched with him at the Savoy.

She had accosted and claimed acquaintance with Alistair Blunt and laid claim to an intimacy with his wife.

She had twice visited King Leopold Mansions where, later, a dead body had been found dressed in her clothes and with her handbag conveniently identifying it.

A little too convenient, that!

She had left the Glengowrie Court Hotel suddenly after an interview with the police. Could the theory that Hercule Poirot believed to be true account for and explain all those facts?

He thought it could.

III

These meditations had occupied Hercule Poirot on his homeward way until reaching Regent's Park. He decided to traverse a part of the Park before taking a taxi on. By experience, he knew to a nicety the moment when his smart patent leather shoes began to press painfully on his feet. It was a lovely summer's day and Poirot looked indulgently on courting nursemaids and their swains, laughing and giggling while their chubby charges profited by nurse's inattention. Dogs barked and romped.

Little boys sailed boats.

And under nearly every tree was a couple sitting close together...

'Ah! Jeunesse, Jeunesse,' murmured Hercule Poirot, pleurably affected by the sight. They were chic, these little London girls. They wore their tawdry clothes with an air. Their figures, however, he considered lamentably deficient. Where were the rich curves, the voluptuous lines that had formerly delighted the eye of an admirer?

He, Hercule Poirot, remembered women... One woman, in particular—what a sumptuous creature—Bird of Paradise—a Venus...

What woman was there amongst these pretty chits nowadays, who could hold a candle to Countess Vera Rossakoff? A genuine Russian aristocrat, an aristocrat to her fingertips! And also, he remembered, a most accomplished thief... One of those natural geniuses...

With a sigh, Poirot wrenched his thoughts away from the flamboyant creature of his dreams. It was not only, he noted, the little nursemaids and their like who were being wooed under the trees of Regent's Park.

That was a Schiaparelli creation there, under that lime tree, with the young man who bent his head so close to hers, who was pleading so earnestly.

One must not yield too soon! He hoped the girl understood that. The pleasure of the chase must be extended as long as possible...

His beneficent eye still on them, he became suddenly aware of a familiarity in those two figures. So Jane Olivera had come to Regent's Park to meet her young American revolutionary?

His face grew suddenly sad and rather stern.

After only a brief hesitation he crossed the grass to them. Sweeping off his hat with a flourish, he said:

‘Bonjour, Mademoiselle.’

Jane Olivera, he thought, was not entirely displeased to see him. Howard Raikes, on the other hand, was a good deal annoyed at the interruption. He growled: ‘Oh, so it’s you again!’

‘Good afternoon, M. Poirot,’ said Jane. ‘How unexpectedly you always pop up, don’t you?’

‘Kind of a Jack in the Box,’ said Raikes, still eyeing Poirot with a considerable coldness.

‘I do not intrude?’ Poirot asked anxiously.

Jane Olivera said kindly:

‘Not at all.’

Howard Raikes said nothing.

‘It is a pleasant spot you have found here,’ said Poirot.

‘It was,’ said Mr Raikes.

Jane said:

‘Be quiet, Howard. You need to learn manners!’

Howard Raikes snorted and asked:

‘What’s the good of manners?’

‘You’ll find they kind of help you along,’ said Jane. ‘I haven’t got any myself, but that doesn’t matter so much. To begin with I’m rich, and I’m moderately good-looking, and I’ve got a lot of influential friends—and none of those unfortunate disabilities they talk about so freely in the advertisements nowadays. I can get along all right without manners.’

Raikes said:

‘I’m not in the mood for small talk, Jane. I guess I’ll take myself off.’

He got up, nodded curtly to Poirot and strode away.

Jane Olivera stared after him, her chin cupped in her palm.

Poirot said with a sigh:

‘Alas, the proverb is true. When you are courting, two is company, is it not, three is none?’

Jane said:

‘Courting? What a word!’

‘But yes, it is the right word, is it not? For a young man who pays attention to a young lady before asking her hand in marriage? They say, do they not, a courting couple?’

‘Your friends seem to say some very funny things.’

Hercule Poirot chanted softly:

‘Thirteen, fourteen, maids are courting. See, all around us they are doing it.’

Jane said sharply:

‘Yes—I’m just one of the crowd, I suppose...’

She turned suddenly to Poirot.

‘I want to apologize to you. I made a mistake the other day. I thought you had wormed your way in and come down to Exsham just to spy on Howard. But afterwards Uncle Alistair told me that he had definitely asked you because he wanted you to clear up this business of that missing woman—Sainsbury Seale. That’s right, isn’t it?’

‘Absolutely.’

‘So I’m sorry for what I said to you that evening. But it did look like it, you know. I mean—as though you were just following Howard and spying on us both.’

‘Even if it were true, Mademoiselle—I was an excellent witness to the fact that Mr Raikes bravely saved your uncle’s life by springing on his assailant and preventing him from firing another shot.’

‘You’ve got a funny way of saying things, M. Poirot. I never know whether you’re serious or not.’

Poirot said gravely:

‘At the moment I am very serious, Miss Olivera.’

Jane said with a slight break in her voice:

‘Why do you look at me like that? As though—as though you were sorry for me?’

‘Perhaps because I am sorry, Mademoiselle, for the things that I shall have to do so soon...’

‘Well, then—don’t do them!’

‘Alas, Mademoiselle, but I must...’

She stared at him for a minute or two, then she said:

‘Have you—found that woman?’

Poirot said:

‘Let us say—that I know where she is.’

‘Is she dead?’

‘I have not said so.’

‘She’s alive, then?’

‘I have not said that either.’

Jane looked at him with irritation. She exclaimed:

‘Well, she’s got to be one or the other, hasn’t she?’

‘Actually, it’s not quite so simple.’

'I believe you just like making things difficult!'

'It has been said of me,' admitted Hercule Poirot.

Jane shivered. She said:

'Isn't it funny? It's a lovely warm day—and yet I suddenly feel cold...'

'Perhaps you had better walk on, Mademoiselle.'

Jane rose to her feet. She stood a minute irresolute. She said abruptly:

'Howard wants me to marry him. At once. Without letting anyone know. He says—he says it's the only way I'll ever do it—that I'm weak—' She broke off, then with one hand she gripped Poirot's arm with surprising strength. 'What shall I do about it, M. Poirot?'

'Why ask me to advise you? There are those who are nearer!'

'Mother? She'd scream the house down at the bare idea! Uncle Alistair? He'd be cautious and prosy. Plenty of time, my dear. Got to make quite sure, you know. Bit of an odd fish—this young man of yours. No sense in rushing things —'

'Your friends?' suggested Poirot.

'I haven't got any friends. Only a silly crowd I drink and dance and talk inane catchwords with!

Howard's the only real person I've ever come up against.'

'Still—why ask me, Miss Olivera?'

Jane said:

'Because you've got a queer look on your face—as though you were sorry about something—as though you knew something that—that—was—coming...'

She stopped.

'Well?' she demanded. 'What do you say?'

Hercule Poirot slowly shook his head.

IV

When Poirot reached home, George said:

'Chief Inspector Japp is here, sir.'

Japp grinned in a rueful way as Poirot came into the room.

'Here I am, old boy. Come round to say: "Aren't you a marvel? How do you do it? What makes you think of these things?"'

'All this meaning—? But pardon, you will have some refreshment? A sirop? Or perhaps the whisky?'

'The whisky is good enough for me.'

A few minutes later he raised his glass, observing:

'Here's to Hercule Poirot who is always right!'

‘No, no, mon ami.’

‘Here we had a lovely case of suicide. H.P. says it’s murder—wants it to be murder—and dash it all, it is murder!’

‘Ah? So you agree at last?’

‘Well, nobody can say I’m pig-headed. I don’t fly in the face of evidence. The trouble was there wasn’t any evidence before.’

‘But there is now?’

‘Yes, and I’ve come round to make the amend honourable, as you call it, and present the titbit to you on toast, as it were.’

‘I am all agog, my good Japp.’

‘All right. Here goes. The pistol that Frank Carter tried to shoot Blunt with on Saturday is a twin pistol to the one that killed Morley!’

Poirot stared: ‘But this is extraordinary!’

‘Yes, it makes it look rather black for Master Frank.’

‘It is not conclusive.’

‘No, but it’s enough to make us reconsider the suicide verdict. They’re a foreign make of pistol and rather an uncommon one at that!’

Hercule Poirot stared. His eyebrows looked like crescent moons. He said at last:

‘Frank Carter? No—surely not!’

Japp breathed a sigh of exasperation.

‘What’s the matter with you, Poirot? First you will have it that Morley was murdered and that it wasn’t suicide. Then when I come and tell you we’re inclined to come round to your views you hem and ha and don’t seem to like it.’

‘You really believe that Morley was murdered by Frank Carter?’

‘It fits. Carter had got a grudge against Morley—that we knew all along. He came to Queen Charlotte Street that morning—and he pretended afterwards that he had come along to tell his young woman he’d got a job—but we’ve now discovered that he hadn’t got the job then. He didn’t get it till later in the day. He admits that now. So there’s lie No. 1. He can’t account for where he was at twenty-five past twelve onwards. Says he was walking in the Marylebone Road, but the first thing he can prove is having a drink in a pub at five past one. And the barman says he was in a regular state—his hand shaking and his face as white as a sheet!’

Hercule Poirot sighed and shook his head. He murmured:

‘It does not accord with my ideas.’

‘What are these ideas of yours?’

‘It is very disturbing what you tell me. Very disturbing indeed. Because, you see, if you are right...’

The door opened softly and George murmured deferentially:

‘Excuse me, sir, but...’

He got no further. Miss Gladys Nevill thrust him aside and came agitatedly into the room. She was crying.

‘Oh, M. Poirot—’

‘Here, I’ll be off,’ said Japp hurriedly.

He left the room precipitately.

Gladys Nevill paid him back the tribute of a venomous look.

‘That’s the man—that horrid Inspector from Scotland Yard—it’s he who has trumped up a whole case against poor Frank.’

‘Now, now, you must not agitate yourself.’

‘But he has. First they pretend that he tried to murder this Mr Blunt and not content with that they’ve accused him of murdering poor Mr Morley.’

Hercule Poirot coughed. He said:

‘I was down there, you know, at Exsham, when the shot was fired at Mr Blunt.’

Gladys Nevill said with a somewhat confusing use of pronouns:

‘But even if Frank did—did do a foolish thing like that—and he’s one of those Imperial Shirts, you know—they march with banners and have a ridiculous salute, and of course I suppose Mr Blunt’s wife was a very notorious Jewess, and they just work up these poor young men—quite harmless ones like Frank—until they think they are doing something wonderful and patriotic.’

‘Is that Mr Carter’s defence?’ asked Hercule Poirot.

‘Ohno . Frank just swears he didn’t do anything and had never seen the pistol before. I haven’t spoken to him, of course—they wouldn’t let me—but he’s got a solicitor acting for him and he told me what Frank had said. Frank just says it’s all a frame-up.’

Poirot murmured:

‘And the solicitor is of opinion that his client had better think of a more plausible story?’

‘Lawyers are so difficult. They won’t say anything straight out . But it’s the murder charge I’m worrying about. Oh! M. Poirot, I’m sure Frank couldn’t have killed Mr Morley. I mean really—he hadn’t any reason to.’

‘Is it true,’ said Poirot, ‘that when he came round that morning he had not yet got a job of any kind?’

‘Well, really, M. Poirot, I don’t see what difference that makes. Whether he got the job in the morning or the afternoon can’t matter.’

Poirot said:

‘But his story was that he came to tell you about his good luck. Now, it seems, he had as yet had no luck. Why, then, did he come?’

‘Well, M. Poirot, the poor boy was dispirited and upset, and to tell the truth I believe he’d been drinking a little. Poor Frank has rather a weak head—and the drink upset him and so he felt like—like making a row, and he came round to Queen Charlotte Street to have it out with Mr Morley, because, you see, Frank is awfully sensitive and it had upset him a lot to feel that Mr Morley disapproved of him, and was what he called poisoning my mind.’

‘So he conceived the idea of making a scene in business hours?’

‘Well—yes—I suppose that was his idea. Of course it was very wrong of Frank to think of such a thing.’

Poirot looked thoughtfully at the tearful blonde young woman in front of him. He said:

‘Did you know that Frank Carter had a pistol—or a pair of pistols?’

‘Oh no, M. Poirot. I swear I didn’t. And I don’t believe it’s true, either.’

Poirot shook his head slowly in a perplexed manner.

‘Oh! M. Poirot, do help us. If I could only feel that you were on our side—’

Poirot said:

‘I do not take sides. I am on the side only of the truth.’

V

After he had got rid of the girl, Poirot rang up Scotland Yard. Japp had not yet returned but Detective Sergeant Beddoes was obliging and informative.

The police had not as yet found any evidence to prove Frank Carter’s possession of the pistol before the assault at Exsham.

Poirot hung up the receiver thoughtfully. It was a point in Carter’s favour. But so far it was the only one. He had also learned from Beddoes a few more details as to the statement Frank Carter had made about his employment as gardener at Exsham. He stuck to his story of a Secret Service job. He had been given money in advance and some testimonials as to his gardening abilities and been told to apply to Mr MacAlister, the head gardener, for the post.

His instructions were to listen to the other gardeners’ conversations and sound them as to their ‘red’ tendencies, and to pretend to be a bit of a ‘red’ himself. He had been interviewed and instructed in his task by a woman who had told him that she was known as Q.H.56, and that he had been recommended to her as a strong anti-communist. She had interviewed him in a dim light and he did not think he would know her again. She was a red-haired lady with a lot of make-up on. Poirot groaned. The Phillips Oppenheim touch seemed to be reappearing. He was tempted to consult Mr Barnes on the subject.

According to Mr Barnes these things happened.

The last post brought him something which disturbed him more still. A cheap envelope in an unformed handwriting, postmarked Hertfordshire. Poirot opened it and read:

Dear Sir,—

Hoping as you will forgive me for troubling you, but I am very worried and do not know what to do. I do not want to be mixed up with the police in any way. I know that perhaps I ought to have told something I know before, but as they said the master had shot himself it was all right I thought and I wouldn’t have liked to get Miss Nevill’s young man into trouble and never thought really for one moment as he had done it but now I see he has been took up for shooting at a gentleman in the country and so perhaps he isn’t quite all there and I ought to say but I thought I would write to you, you being a friend of the mistress and asking me so particular the other day if there was anything and of course I wish now I had told you then. But I do hope it won’t mean getting mixed up with the police because I shouldn’t like that and my mother wouldn’t like it either. She has always been most particular. Yours respectfully

Agnes Fletcher.

Poirot murmured:

‘I always knew it was something to do with some man. I guessed the wrong man, that is all.’

Fifteen, Sixteen,

Maids in the Kitchen

I

The interview with Agnes Fletcher took place in Hertford, in a somewhat derelict teashop, for Agnes had been anxious not to tell her story under Miss Morley's critical eye. The first quarter of an hour was taken up listening to exactly how particular Agnes' mother had always been. Also how Agnes' father, though a proprietor of licensed premises, had never once had any friction with the police, closing time being strictly observed to the second, and indeed Agnes' father and mother were universally respected and looked up to in Little Darlington, Gloucestershire, and none of Mrs Fletcher's family of six (two having died in infancy) had ever occasioned their parents the least anxiety. And if Agnes, now, were to get mixed up with the police in any way, Mum and Dad would probably die of it, because as she'd been saying, they'd always held their heads high, and never had no trouble of any kind with the police.

After this had been repeated, da capo, and with various embellishments, several times, Agnes drew a little nearer to the subject of the interview.

'I wouldn't like to say anything to Miss Morley, sir, because it might be, you see, that she'd say as how I ought to have said something before, but me and cook, we talked it over and we didn't see as it was any business of ours, because we'd read quite clear and plain in the paper as how the master had made a mistake in the drug he was giving and that he'd shot himself and the pistol was in his hands and everything, so it did seem quite clear, didn't it, sir?'

'When did you begin to feel differently?' Poirot hoped to get a little nearer the promised revelation by an encouraging but not too direct question.

Agnes replied promptly.

'Seeing it in the paper about that Frank Carter—Miss Nevill's young man as was. When I read as he'd shot at that gentleman where he was gardener, well, I thought, it looks as if he might be queer in the head, because I do know there's people it takes like that, think they're being persecuted, or something, and that they're ringed round by enemies, and in the end it's dangerous to keep them at home and they have to be took away to the asylum. And I thought that maybe that Frank Carter was like that, because I did remember that he used to go on about Mr Morley and say as Mr Morley was against him and trying to separate him from Miss Nevill, but of course she wouldn't hear a word against him, and quite right too we thought—Emma and me, because you couldn't deny as Mr Carter was very nice-looking and quite the gentleman. But, of course, neither of us thought he'd really done anything to Mr Morley. We just thought it was a bit queer if you know what I mean.'

Poirot said patiently:

'What was queer?'

'It was that morning, sir, the morning Mr Morley shot himself. I'd been wondering if I dared run down and get the post. The postman had come but that Alfred hadn't brought up the letters, which he wouldn't do, not unless there was some for Miss Morley or Mr Morley, but if it was just for Emma and me he wouldn't bother to bring them up till lunch time.

'So I went out on the landing and I looked down over the stairs. Miss Morley didn't like us going down to the hall, not during the master's business hours, but I thought maybe as I'd see Alfred taking in a patient to the master and I'd call down to him as he came back.'

Agnes gasped, took a deep breath and went on: 'And it was then I saw him—that Frank Carter, I mean. Halfway up the stairs he was—our stairs, I mean, above the master's floor. And he was standing there waiting and looking down—and I've come to feel more and more as though there was something queer about it. He seemed to be listening very intent, if you know what I mean?'

'What time was this?'

'It must have been getting on for half-past twelve, sir. And just as I was thinking: There now, it's Frank Carter, and Miss Nevill's away for the day and won't he be disappointed, and I was wondering if I ought to run down and tell him because it looked as though that lump of an Alfred had forgot, otherwise I thought he wouldn't have been waiting for her. And just as I was hesitating, Mr Carter, he seemed to make up his mind, and he slipped down the stairs very quick and went along the passage towards the master's surgery, and I thought to myself, the master won't like that, and I wondered if there was going to be a row, but just then Emma called me, said whatever was I up to? and I went up again and then, afterwards, I heard the master had shot himself and, of course, it was so awful it just drove everything out of my head. But later, when that Police Inspector had gone I said to Emma, I said, I didn't say anything about Mr Carter having been up with the master this morning, and she said was he? and I told her, and she said well, perhaps I ought to tell, but anyway I said I'd better wait a bit, and she agreed, because neither of us didn't want to get Frank Carter into trouble if we could help. And then, when it came to the inquest and it come out that the master had made that mistake in a drug and really had got the wind up and shot himself, quite natural-like—well, then, of course, there was no call to say anything. But reading that piece in the paper two days ago—Oh! it did give me a turn! And I said to myself, "If he's one of those loonies that thinks they're persecuted and goes round shooting people, well, then maybe he did shoot the master after all!"'

Her eyes, anxious and scared, looked hopefully at Hercule Poirot. He put as much reassurance into his voice as he could.

'You may be sure that you have done absolutely the right thing in telling me, Agnes,' he said.

'Well, I must say, sir, it does take a load off my mind. You see, I've kept saying to myself as perhaps I ought to tell. And then, you see, I thought of getting mixed up with the police and what mother would say. She's always been so particular about us all...'

'Yes, yes,' said Hercule Poirot hastily.

He had had, he felt, as much of Agnes' mother as he could stand for one afternoon. II

Poirot called at Scotland Yard and asked for Japp. When he was taken up to the Chief Inspector's room: 'I want to see Carter,' said Hercule Poirot.

Japp shot him a quick, sideways glance.

He said:

'What's the big idea?'

'You are unwilling?'

Japp shrugged his shoulders. He said:

'Oh, I shan't make objections. No good if I did. Who's the Home Secretary's little pet? You are. Who's got half the Cabinet in his pocket? You have. Hushing up their scandals for them.'

Poirot's mind flew for a moment to that case that he had named the Case of the Augean Stables. He murmured, not without complacency:

'It was ingenious, yes? You must admit it. Well imagined, let us say.'

'Nobody but you would ever have thought of such a thing! Sometimes, Poirot, I think you haven't any scruples at all!'

Poirot's face became suddenly grave. He said:

'That is not true.'

'Oh, all right, Poirot, I didn't mean it. But you're so pleased sometimes with your damned ingenuity. What do you want to see Carter for? To ask him whether he really murdered Morley?’

To Japp’s surprise, Poirot nodded his head emphatically.

‘Yes, my friend, that is exactly the reason.’

‘And I suppose you think he’ll tell you if he did?’

Japp laughed as he spoke. But Hercule Poirot remained grave. He said:

‘He might tell me—yes.’

Japp looked at him curiously. He said:

‘You know, I’ve known you a long time—twenty years? Something like that. But I still don’t always catch on to what you’re driving at. I know you’ve got a bee in your bonnet about young Frank Carter. For some reason or other, you don’t want him to be guilty—’

Hercule Poirot shook his head energetically.

‘No, no, there you are wrong. It is the other way about—’

‘I thought perhaps it was on account of that girl of his—the blonde piece. You’re a sentimental old buzzard in some ways—’

Poirot was immediately indignant.

‘It is not I who am sentimental! That is an English failing! It is in England that they weep over young sweethearts and dying mothers and devoted children. Me, I am logical. If Frank Carter is a killer, then I am certainly not sentimental enough to wish to unite him in marriage to a nice but commonplace girl who, if he is hanged, will forget him in a year or two and find someone else!’

‘Then why don’t you want to believe he is guilty?’

‘I do want to believe he is guilty.’

‘I suppose you mean that you’ve got hold of something which more or less conclusively proves him to be innocent? Why hold it up, then? You ought to play fair with us, Poirot.’

‘I am playing fair with you. Presently, very shortly, I will give you the name and address of a witness who will be invaluable to you for the prosecution. Her evidence ought to clinch the case against him.’

‘But then—Oh! You’ve got me all tangled up. Why are you so anxious to see him.’

‘To satisfy myself,’ said Hercule Poirot.

And he would say no more.

III

Frank Carter, haggard, white-faced, still feebly inclined to bluster, looked on his unexpected visitor with unconcealed disfavour. He said rudely:

‘So it’s you, you ruddy little foreigner? What do you want?’

‘I want to see you and talk to you.’

‘Well, you see me all right. But I won’t talk. Not without my lawyer. That’s right, isn’t it? You can’t go against that. I’ve got the right to have my solicitor present before I say a word.’

‘Certainly you have. You can send for him if you like—but I should prefer that you did not.’

‘I dare say. Think you’re going to trap me into making some damaging admissions, eh?’

‘We are quite alone, remember.’

‘That’s a bit unusual, isn’t it? Got your police pals listening-in, no doubt.’

‘You are wrong. This is a private interview between you and me.’

Frank Carter laughed. He looked cunning and unpleasant. He said:

‘Come off it! You don’t take me in with that old gag.’

‘Do you remember a girl called Agnes Fletcher?’

‘Never heard of her.’

‘I think you will remember her, though you may never have taken much notice of her. She was house-parlourmaid at 58, Queen Charlotte Street.’

‘Well, what of it?’

Hercule Poirot said slowly:

‘On the morning of the day that Mr Morley was shot, this girl Agnes happened to look over the banisters from the top floor. She saw you on the stairs—waiting and listening. Presently she saw you go along to Mr Morley’s room. The time was then twenty-six minutes or thereabouts past twelve.’

Frank Carter trembled violently. Sweat came out on his brow. His eyes, more furtive than ever, went wildly from side to side. He shouted angrily:

‘It’s a lie! It’s a damned lie! You’ve paid her—the police have paid her—to say she saw me.’

‘At that time,’ said Hercule Poirot, ‘by your own account, you had left the house and were walking in the Marylebone Road.’

‘So I was. That girl’s lying. She couldn’t have seen me. It’s a dirty plot. If it’s true, why didn’t she say so before?’

Hercule Poirot said quietly:

‘She did mention it at the time to her friend and colleague the cook. They were worried and puzzled and didn’t know what to do. When a verdict of suicide was brought in they were much relieved and decided that it wasn’t necessary for them to say anything.’

‘I don’t believe a word of it! They’re in it together, that’s all. A couple of dirty, lying little...’

He tailed off into furious profanity.

Hercule Poirot waited.

When Carter’s voice at last ceased, Poirot spoke again, still in the same calm, measured voice.

‘Anger and foolish abuse will not help you. These girls are going to tell their story and it is going to be believed. Because, you see, they are telling the truth. The girl, Agnes Fletcher, did see you. You were there, on the stairs, at that time. You had not left the house. And you did go into Mr Morley’s room.’

He paused and then asked quietly:

‘What happened then?’

‘It’s a lie, I tell you!’

Hercule Poirot felt very tired—very old. He did not like Frank Carter. He disliked him very much. In his opinion Frank Carter was a bully, a liar, a swindler—altogether the type of young man the world could well do without. He, Hercule Poirot, had only to stand back and let this young man persist in his lies and the world would be rid of one of its more unpleasant inhabitants...

Hercule Poirot said:

‘I suggest you tell me the truth...’

He realized the issue very clearly. Frank Carter was stupid—but he wasn’t so stupid as not to see that to persist in his denial was his best and safest course. Let him once admit that he had gone into that room at twenty-six minutes past twelve and he was taking a step into grave danger. For after that, any story he told would have a good chance of being considered a lie.

Let him persist in his denial, then. If so, Hercule Poirot’s duty would be over. Frank Carter would in all probability be hanged for the murder of Henry Morley—and it might be, justly hanged. Hercule Poirot had only to get up and go.

Frank Carter said again:

‘It’s a lie!’

There was a pause. Hercule Poirot did not get up and go. He would have liked to do so—very much. Nevertheless, he remained.

He leaned forward. He said—and his voice held all the compelling power of his powerful personality—

‘I am not lying to you. I ask you to believe me. If you did not kill Morley your only hope is to tell me the exact truth of what happened that morning.’

The mean, treacherous face looking at him wavered, became uncertain. Frank Carter pulled at his lip. His eyes went from side to side, terrified, frankly animal eyes.

It was touch and go now...

Then suddenly, overborne by the strength of the personality confronting him, Frank Carter surrendered. He said hoarsely:

‘All right then—I’ll tell you. God curse you if you let me down now! I did go in...I went up the stairs and waited till I could be sure of getting him alone. Waited there, up above Morley’s landing. Then a gent came out and went down—fat gent. I was just making up my mind to go—when another gent came out of Morley’s room and went down too. I knew I’d got to be quick. I went along and nipped into his room without knocking. I was all set to have it out with him. Mucking about, putting my girl against me—damn him—’

He stopped.

‘Yes?’ said Hercule Poirot: and his voice was still urgent—compelling—

Carter’s voice croaked uncertainly.

‘And he was lying there—dead. It’s true! I swear it’s true! Lying just as they said at the inquest. I couldn’t believe it at first. I stooped over him. But he was dead all right. His hand was stone cold and I saw the bullet hole in his head with a hard black crust of blood round it...’

At the memory of it, sweat broke out on his forehead again.

'I saw then I was in a jam. They'd go and say I'd done it. I hadn't touched anything except his hand and the door-handle. I wiped that with my handkerchief, both sides, as I went out, and I stole downstairs as quickly as I could. There was nobody in the hall and I let myself out and legged it away as fast as I could. No wonder I felt queer.'

He paused. His scared eyes went to Poirot.

'That's the truth. I swear that's the truth... He was dead already. You've got to believe me!'

Poirot got up. He said—and his voice was tired and sad—'I believe you.'

He moved towards the door.

Frank Carter cried out:

'They'll hang me—they'll hang me for a cert if they know I was in there.'

Poirot said:

'By telling the truth you have saved yourself from being hanged.'

'I don't see it. They'll say—'

Poirot interrupted him.

'Your story has confirmed what I knew to be the truth. You can leave it now to me.'

He went out.

He was not at all happy.

IV

He reached Mr Barnes' House at Ealing at 6.45. He remembered that Mr Barnes had called that a good time of day.

Mr Barnes was at work in his garden.

He said by way of greeting:

'We need rain, M. Poirot—need it badly.'

He looked thoughtfully at his guest. He said:

'You don't look very well, M. Poirot?'

'Sometimes,' said Hercule Poirot, 'I do not like the things I have to do.'

Mr Barnes nodded his head sympathetically.

He said:

'I know.'

Hercule Poirot looked vaguely round at the neat arrangement of the small beds. He murmured:

'It is well-planned, this garden. Everything is to scale. It is small but exact.'

Mr Barnes said:

‘When you have only a small place you’ve got to make the most of it. You can’t afford to make mistakes in the planning.’

Hercule Poirot nodded.

Barnes went on:

‘I see you’ve got your man?’

‘Frank Carter?’

‘Yes. I’m rather surprised, really.’

‘You did not think that it was, so to speak, a private murder?’

‘No. Frankly I didn’t. What with Amberiotis and Alistair Blunt—I made sure that it was one of these Espionage or Counter-Espionage mix-ups.’

‘That is the view you expounded to me at our first meeting.’

‘I know. I was quite sure of it at the time.’

Poirot said slowly:

‘But you were wrong.’

‘Yes. Don’t rub it in. The trouble is, one goes by one’s own experience. I’ve been mixed up in that sort of thing so much I suppose I’m inclined to see it everywhere.’

Poirot said:

‘You have observed in your time a conjurer offer a card, have you not? What is called—forcing a card?’

‘Yes, of course.’

‘That is what was done here. Every time that one thinks of a private reason for Morley’s death, hey presto—the card is forced on one. Amberiotis, Alistair Blunt, the unsettled state of politics—of the country—’ He shrugged his shoulders. ‘As for you, Mr Barnes, you did more to mislead me than anybody.’

‘Oh, I say, Poirot, I’m sorry. I suppose that’s true.’

‘You were in a position to know, you see. So your words carried weight.’

‘Well—I believed what I said. That’s the only apology I can make.’

He paused and sighed.

‘And all the time, it was a purely private motive?’

‘Exactly. It has taken me a long time to see the reason for the murder—although I had one very definite piece of luck.’

‘What was that?’

‘A fragment of conversation. Really a very illuminating fragment if only I had had the sense to realize its significance at the time.’

Mr Barnes scratched his nose thoughtfully with the trowel. A small piece of earth adhered to the side of his nose.

'Being rather cryptic, aren't you?' he asked genially.

Hercule Poirot shrugged his shoulders. He said:

'I am, perhaps, aggrieved that you were not more frank with me.'

'I?'

'Yes.'

'My dear fellow—I never had the least idea of Carter's guilt. As far as I knew, he'd left the house long before Morley was killed. I suppose now they've found he didn't leave when he said he did?'

Poirot said:

'Carter was in the house at twenty-six minutes past twelve. He actually saw the murderer.'

'Then Carter didn't—'

'Carter saw the murderer, I tell you!'

Mr Barnes said:

'Did he recognize him?'

Slowly Hercule Poirot shook his head.

Seventeen, Eighteen,

Maids in Waiting

I

On the following day Hercule Poirot spent some hours with a theatrical agent of his acquaintance. In the afternoon he went to Oxford. On the day after that he drove down to the country—it was late when he returned.

He had telephoned before he left to make an appointment with Mr Alistair Blunt for that same evening. It was half-past nine when he reached the Gothic House.

Alistair Blunt was alone in his library when Poirot was shown in. He looked an eager question at his visitor as he shook hands.

He said:

'Well?'

Slowly, Hercule Poirot nodded his head.

Blunt looked at him in almost incredulous appreciation.

'Have you found her?'

'Yes. Yes, I have found her.'

He sat down. And he sighed.

Alistair Blunt said:

'You are tired?'

‘Yes. I am tired. And it is not pretty—what I have to tell you.’

Blunt said:

‘Is she dead?’

‘That depends,’ said Hercule Poirot slowly, ‘on how you like to look at it.’

Blunt frowned.

He said:

‘My dear man, a person must be dead or alive. Miss Sainsbury Seale must be one or the other!’

‘Ah, but who is Miss Sainsbury Seale?’

Alistair Blunt said:

‘You don’t mean that—that there isn’t any such person?’

‘Oh no, no. There was such a person. She lived in Calcutta. She taught elocution. She busied herself with good works. She came to England in the Maharajah—the same boat in which Mr Amberiotis travelled. Although they were not in the same class, he helped her over something—some fuss about her luggage. He was, it would seem, a kindly man in little ways. And sometimes, M. Blunt, kindness is repaid in an unexpected fashion. It was so, you know, with M. Amberiotis. He chanced to meet the lady again in the streets of London. He was feeling expansive, he good naturedly invited her to lunch with him at the Savoy. An unexpected treat for her. And an unexpected windfall for M. Amberiotis! For his kindness was not pre-meditated—he had no idea that this faded, middle-aged lady was going to present him with the equivalent of a gold mine. But nevertheless, that is what she did, though she never suspected the fact herself.

‘She was never, you see, of the first order of intelligence. A good, well-meaning soul, but the brain, I should say, of a hen.’

Blunt said:

‘Then it wasn’t she who killed the Chapman woman?’

Poirot said slowly:

‘It is difficult to know just how to present the matter. I shall begin, I think, where the matter began for me. With ashoe!’

Blunt said blankly:

‘With ashoe?’

Hercule Poirot nodded.

‘Yes, a buckled shoe. I came out from my séance at the dentist’s and as I stood on the steps of 58, Queen Charlotte Street, a taxi stopped outside, the door opened and a woman’s foot prepared to descend. I am a man who notices a woman’s foot and ankle. It was a well-shaped foot, with a good ankle and an expensive stocking, but I did not like the shoe. It was a new, shining patent leather shoe with a large ornate buckle. Not chic—not at all chic!

‘And whilst I was observing this, the rest of the lady came into sight—and frankly it was a disappointment—a middle-aged lady without charm and badly dressed.’

‘Miss Sainsbury Seale?’

‘Precisely. As she descended a contretemps occurred—she caught the buckle of her shoe in the door and it was wrenched off. I picked it up and returned it to her. That was all. The incident was closed.

‘Later, on that same day, I went with Chief Inspector Japp to interview the lady. (She had not as yet sewn on the buckle, by the way.)

‘On that same evening, Miss Sainsbury Seale walked out of her hotel and vanished. That, shall we say, is the end of Part One.

‘Part Two began when Chief Inspector Japp summoned me to King Leopold Mansions. There was a fur chest in a flat there, and in that fur chest there had been found a body. I went into the room, I walked up to the chest—and the first thing I saw was a shabby buckled shoe!’

‘Well?’

‘You have not appreciated the point. It was a shabby shoe—a well-worn shoe. But you see, Miss Sainsbury Seale had come to King Leopold Mansions on the evening of that same day—the day of Mr Morley’s murder. In the morning the shoes were new shoes—in the evening they were old shoes. One does not wear out a pair of shoes in a day, you comprehend.’

Alistair Blunt said without much interest:

‘She could have two pairs of shoes, I suppose?’

‘Ah, but that was not so. For Japp and I had gone up to her room at the Glengowrie Court and had looked at all her possessions—and there was no pair of buckled shoes there. She might have had an old pair of shoes, yes. She might have changed into them after a tiring day to go out in the evening, yes? But if so, the other pair would have been at the hotel. It was curious, you will admit?’

‘I can’t see that it is important.’

‘No, not important. Not at all important. But one does not like things that one cannot explain. I stood by the fur chest and I looked at the shoe—the buckle had recently been sewn on by hand. I will confess that I then had a moment of doubt—of myself. Yes, I said to myself, Hercule Poirot, you were a little light-headed perhaps this morning. You saw the world through rosy spectacles. Even the old shoes looked like new ones to you?’

‘Perhaps that was the explanation?’

‘But no, it was not. My eyes do not deceive me! To continue, I studied the dead body of this woman and I did not like what I saw. Why had the face been wantonly, deliberately smashed and rendered unrecognizable?’

Alistair Blunt moved restlessly. He said:

‘Must we go over that again? We know—’

Hercule Poirot said firmly:

‘It is necessary. I have to take you over the steps that led me at last to the truth. I said to myself:

“Something is wrong here. Here is a dead woman in the clothes of Miss Sainsbury Seale (except, perhaps, the shoes?) and with the handbag of Miss Sainsbury Seale—but why is her face unrecognizable? Is it, perhaps, because the face is not the face of Miss Sainsbury Seale?” And immediately I begin to put together what I have heard of the appearance of the other woman—the woman to whom the flat belongs, and I ask myself—Might it not perhaps be this other woman who lies dead here? I go then and look at the other woman’s bedroom. I try to picture to myself what sort of woman she is. In superficial appearance, very different to the other. Smart, showily dressed, very much made up. But in essentials, not unlike. Hair, build, age... But there is one difference. Mrs Albert Chapman took a five in shoes. Miss Sainsbury Seale, I knew, took a 10-inch stocking—that is to say she would take at least a 6 in shoes. Mrs Chapman, then, had smaller feet than Miss Sainsbury Seale. I went back to the body. If my half-formed idea was right, and the body was that of Mrs Chapman wearing Miss Sainsbury Seale’s clothes, then the shoes should be too big . I took hold of one. But it was not loose. It fitted tightly. That looked as though it were the body of Miss Sainsbury Seale after all! But in that case, why was the face disfigured? Her identity was already proved by the handbag, which could easily have been removed, but which had not been removed.

‘It was a puzzle—a tangle. In desperation I seized on Mrs Chapman’s address book—a dentist was the only person who could prove definitely who the dead woman was—or was not. By coincidence, Mrs Chapman’s dentist was Mr Morley. Morley was dead, but identification was still possible. You know the result. The body was identified in the Coroner’s Court by Mr Morley’s successor as that of Mrs Albert Chapman.’

Blunt was fidgeting with some impatience, but Poirot took no notice. He went on:

‘I was left now with a psychological problem. What sort of a woman was Mabelle Sainsbury Seale?’

There were two answers to that question. The first was the obvious one borne out by her whole life in India and by the testimony of her personal friends. That depicted her as an earnest, conscientious, slightly stupid woman. Was there another Miss Sainsbury Seale? Apparently there was. There was a woman who had lunched with a well-known foreign agent, who had accosted you in the street and claimed to be a close friend of your wife’s (a statement that was almost certainly untrue), a woman who had left a man’s house very shortly before a murder had been committed, a woman who had visited another woman on the evening when in all probability that other woman had been murdered, and who had since disappeared although she must be aware that the police force of England was looking for her. Were all these actions compatible with the character which her friends gave her? It would seem that they were not. Therefore, if Miss Sainsbury Seale were not the good, amiable creature she seemed, then it would appear that she was quite possibly a cold-blooded murderess or almost certainly an accomplice after the fact.

‘I had one more criterion—my own personal impression. I had talked to Mabelle Sainsbury Seale myself. How had she struck me? And that, M. Blunt, was the most difficult question to answer of all. Everything that she said, her way of talking, her manner, her gestures, all were perfectly in accord with her given character. But they were equally in accord with a clever actress playing a part. And, after all, Mabelle Sainsbury Seale had started life as an actress.

‘I had been much impressed by a conversation I had had with Mr Barnes of Ealing who had also been a patient at 58, Queen Charlotte Street on that particular day. His theory, expressed very forcibly, was that the deaths of Morley and of Amberiotis were only incidental, so to speak—that the intended victim was you.’

Alistair Blunt said:

‘Oh, come now—that’s a bit far-fetched.’

‘Is it, M. Blunt? Is it not true that at this moment there are various groups of people to whom it is vital that you should be—removed, shall we say? Shall be no longer capable of exerting your influence?’

Blunt said:

‘Oh yes, that’s true enough. But why mix up this business of Morley’s death with that?’

Poirot said:

‘Because there is a certain—how shall I put it?—lavishness about the case—Expense is no object—human life is no object. Yes, there is a recklessness, a lavishness—that points to a big crime!’

‘You don’t think Morley shot himself because of a mistake?’

‘I never thought so—not for a minute. No, Morley was murdered, Amberiotis was murdered, an unrecognizable woman was murdered—Why? For some big stake. Barnes’ theory was that somebody had tried to bribe Morley or his partner to put you out of the way.’

Alistair Blunt said sharply:

‘Nonsense!’

‘Ah, but is it nonsense? Say one wishes to put someone out of the way. Yes, but that someone is forewarned, forearmed, difficult of access. To kill that person it is necessary to be able to approach him without awakening his suspicions—and where would a man be less suspicious than in a dentist’s chair?’

‘Well, that’s true, I suppose. I never thought of it like that.’

‘Tis true. And once I realized it I had my first vague glimmering of the truth.’

‘So you accepted Barnes’ theory? Who is Barnes, by the way?’

‘Barnes was Reilly’s twelve o’clock patient. He is retired from the Home Office and lives in Ealing. An insignificant little man. But you are wrong when you say I accepted his theory. I did not. I only accepted the principle of it.’

‘What do you mean?’

Hercule Poirot said:

‘All along, all the way through, I have been led astray—sometimes unwittingly, sometimes deliberately and for a purpose. All along it was presented to me, forced upon me, that this was what you might call a public crime. That is to say, that you, M. Blunt, were the focus of it all, in your public character. You, the banker, you the controller of finance, you, the upholder of conservative tradition!

‘But every public character has a private life also. That was my mistake, I forgot the private life. There existed private reasons for killing Morley—Frank Carter’s for instance.

‘There could also exist private reasons for killing you ... You had relations who would inherit money when you died. You had people who loved and hated you—as a man—not as a public figure.

‘And so I came to the supreme instance of what I call “the forced card”. The purported attack upon you by Frank Carter. If that attack was genuine—then it was a political crime. But was there any other explanation? There could be. There was a second man in the shrubbery. The man who rushed up and seized Carter. A man who could easily have fired that shot and then tossed the pistol to Carter’s feet so that the latter would almost inevitably pick it up and be found with it in his hand...

‘I considered the problem of Howard Raikes. Raikes had been at Queen Charlotte Street that morning of Morley’s death. Raikes was a bitter enemy of all that you stood for and were. Yes, but Raikes was something more. Raikes was the man who might marry your niece, and with you dead, your niece would inherit a very handsome income, even though you had prudently arranged that she could not touch the principal.

‘Was the whole thing, after all, a private crime—a crime for private gain, for private satisfaction? Why had I thought it a public crime? Because, not once, but many times, that idea had been suggested to me, had been forced upon me like a forced card ...

‘It was then, when that idea occurred to me, that I had my first glimmering of the truth. I was in church at the time and singing a verse of a psalm. It spoke of a snare laid with cords...

‘A snare? Laid for me? Yes, it could be... But in that case who had laid it? There was only one person who could have laid it ... And that did not make sense—did it? Had I been looking at the case upside down? Money no object? Exactly! Reckless disregard of human life? Yes again. For the stakes for which the guilty person was playing were enormous ...

‘But if this new, strange idea of mine were right, it must explain everything. It must explain, for instance, the mystery of the dual nature of Miss Sainsbury Seale. It must solve the riddle of the buckled shoe. And it must answer the question: Where is Miss Sainsbury Seale now?

‘Eh bien—it did all that and more. It showed me that Miss Sainsbury Seale was the beginning and middle and end of the case. No wonder it had seemed to me that there were two Mabelle Sainsbury Seales. There were two Mabelle Sainsbury Seales. There was the good, stupid, amiable woman who was vouched for so confidently by her friends.

And there was the other—the woman who was mixed up with two murders and who told lies and who vanished mysteriously.

‘Remember, the porter at King Leopold Mansions said that Miss Sainsbury Seale had been there once before...

‘In my reconstruction of the case, that first time was the only time. She never left King Leopold Mansions. The other Miss Sainsbury Seale took her place. That other Mabelle Sainsbury Seale, dressed in clothes of the same type and wearing a new pair of shoes with buckles because the others were too large for her, went to the Russell Square Hotel at a busy time of day, packed up the dead woman’s clothes, paid the bill and left. She went to the Glengowrie Court Hotel. None of the real Miss Sainsbury Seale’s friends saw her after that time, remember. She played the part of Mabelle Sainsbury Seale there for over a week. She wore Mabelle Sainsbury Seale’s clothes, she talked in Mabelle Sainsbury Seale’s voice, but she had to buy a smaller pair of evening shoes, too. And then—she vanished, her last appearance being when she was seen re-entering King Leopold Mansions on the evening of the day Morley was killed.’

‘Are you trying to say,’ demanded Alistair Blunt, ‘that it was Mabelle Sainsbury Seale’s dead body in that flat, after all.’

‘Of course it was! It was a very clever double bluff—the smashed face was meant to raise a question of the woman’s identity!’

‘But the dental evidence?’

‘Ah! Now we come to it. It was not the dentist himself who gave evidence. Morley was dead. He couldn’t give evidence as to his own work. He would have known who the dead woman was. It was the charts that were put in as evidence—and the charts were faked. Both women were his patients, remember. All that had to be done was to relabel the charts, exchanging the names.’

Hercule Poirot added:

‘And now you see what I meant when you asked me if the woman was dead and I replied, “That depends.” For when you say “Miss Sainsbury Seale”—which woman do you mean? The woman who disappeared from the Glengowrie Court Hotel or the real Mabelle Sainsbury Seale.’

Alistair Blunt said:

‘I know, M. Poirot, that you have a great reputation. Therefore I accept that you must have some grounds for this extraordinary assumption—for it is an assumption, nothing more. But all I can see is the fantastic improbability of the whole thing. You are saying, are you not, that Mabelle Sainsbury Seale was deliberately murdered and that Morley was also murdered to prevent his identifying her dead body. But why? That’s what I want to know. Here’s this woman—a perfectly harmless, middle-aged woman—with plenty of friends and apparently no enemies. Why on earth all this elaborate plot to get rid of her?’

‘Why? Yes, that is the question. Why? As you say, Mabelle Sainsbury Seale was a perfectly harmless creature who wouldn’t hurt a fly! Why, then, was she deliberately and brutally murdered? Well, I will tell you what I think.’

‘Yes?’

Hercule Poirot leaned forward. He said:

‘It is my belief that Mabelle Sainsbury Seale was murdered because she happened to have too good a memory for faces.’

‘What do you mean?’

Hercule Poirot said:

‘We have separated the dual personality. There is the harmless lady from India. But there is one incident that falls between the two roles. Which Miss Sainsbury Seale was it who spoke to you on the doorstep of Mr Morley's house? She claimed, you will remember, to be "a great friend of your wife's". Now that claim was adjudged by her friends and by the light of ordinary probability to be untrue. So we can say:

"That was a lie. The real Miss Sainsbury Seale does not tell lies." So it was a lie uttered by the impostor for a purpose of her own.'

Alistair Blunt nodded.

'Yes, that reasoning is quite clear. Though I still don't know what the purpose was.'

Poirot said:

'Ah, pardon—but let us first look at it the other way round. It was thereal Miss Sainsbury Seale. She doesnot tell lies. So the story must be true.'

'I suppose you can look at it that way—but it seems very unlikely—'

'Of course it is unlikely! But taking that second hypothesis as fact—the story is true. Therefore Miss Sainsbury Seale did know your wife. She knew her well. Therefore—your wife must have been the type of person Miss Sainsbury Seale would have known well. Someone in her own station of life. An Anglo-Indian—a missionary—or, to go back farther still—an actress—Therefore—not Rebecca Arnholt!

'Now, M. Blunt, do you see what I meant when I talked of a private and a public life? You are the great banker. But you are also a man who married a rich wife. And before you married her you were only a junior partner in the firm—not very long down from Oxford.

'You comprehend—I began to look at the case the right way up. Expense no object? Naturally not—to you. Reckless of human life—that, too, since for a long time you have been virtually a dictator and to a dictator his own life becomes unduly important and those of others unimportant.'

Alistair Blunt said:

'What are you suggesting, M. Poirot?'

Poirot said quietly:

'I am suggesting, M. Blunt, that when you married Rebecca Arnholt, you were married already. That, dazzled by the vista, not so much of wealth, as of power, you suppressed that fact and deliberately committed bigamy. That your real wife acquiesced in the situation.'

'And who was this real wife?'

'Mrs Albert Chapman was the name she went under at King Leopold Mansions—a handy spot, not five minutes' walk from your house on the Chelsea Embankment. You borrowed the name of a real secret agent, realizing that it would give support to her hints of a husband engaged in intelligence work. Your scheme succeeded perfectly. No suspicion was ever aroused. Nevertheless, the fact remained, you had never been legally married to Rebecca Arnholt and you were guilty of bigamy. You never dreamt of danger after so many years. It came out of the blue—in the form of a tiresome woman who remembered you after nearly twenty years, as her friend's husband. Chance brought her back to this country, chance let her meet you in Queen Charlotte Street—it was chance that your niece was with you and heard what she said to you. Otherwise I might never have guessed.'

'I told you about that myself, my dear Poirot.'

'No, it was your niece who insisted on telling me and you could not very well protest too violently in case it might arouse suspicions. And after that meeting, one more evil chance (from your point of view) occurred. Mabelle Sainsbury Seale met Amberiotis, went to lunch with him and babbled to him of this meeting with a friend's husband—"after all these years!"—"Looked older, of course, but had hardly changed!" That, I admit, is pure guess-work on my part but I believe it is what happened. I do not think that Mabelle Sainsbury Seale realized for a moment that the Mr Blunt her friend had married was the shadowy figure behind the finance of the world. The name, after all, is not an uncommon one. But Amberiotis, remember, in addition to his espionage activities, was a blackmailer. Blackmailers have an uncanny nose for a secret. Amberiotis wondered. Easy to find out just who the Mr Blunt was. And then, I have no doubt, he wrote to you or telephoned...Oh, yes—a gold mine for Amberiotis.’

Poirot paused. He went on:

‘There is only one effectual method of dealing with a really efficient and experienced blackmailer. Silence him.

‘It was not a case, as I had had erroneously suggested to me, of “Blunt must go”. It was, on the contrary, “Amberiotis must go”. But the answer was the same! The easiest way to get at a man is when he is off his guard, and when is a man more off his guard than in the dentist’s chair?’

Poirot paused again. A faint smile came to his lips. He said:

‘The truth about the case was mentioned very early. The page-boy, Alfred, was reading a crime story called Death at Eleven Forty-Five . We should have taken that as an omen. For, of course, that is just about the time when Morley was killed. You shot him just as you were leaving. Then you pressed his buzzer, turned on the taps of the wash basin and left the room. You timed it so that you came down the stairs just as Alfred was taking the false Mabelle Sainsbury Seale to the lift. You actually opened the front door, perhaps you passed out, but as the lift doors shut and the lift went up you slipped inside again and went up the stairs.

‘I know, from my own visits, just what Alfred did when he took up a patient. He knocked on the door, opened it, and stood back to let the patient pass in. Inside the water was running—inference, Morley was washing his hands as usual. But Alfred couldn’t actually see him.

‘As soon as Alfred had gone down again in the lift, you slipped along into the surgery. Together you and your accomplice lifted the body and carried it into the adjoining office. Then a quick hunt through the files, and the charts of Mrs Chapman and Miss Sainsbury Seale were cleverly falsified. You put on a white linen coat, perhaps your wife applied a trace of make-up. But nothing much was needed. It was Amberiotis’ first visit to Morley. He had never met you. And your photograph seldom appears in the papers. Besides, why should he have suspicions? A blackmailer does not fear his dentist. Miss Sainsbury Seale goes down and Alfred shows her out. The buzzer goes and Amberiotis is taken up. He finds the dentist washing his hands behind the door in approved fashion. He is conducted to the chair. He indicates the painful tooth. You talk the accustomed patter. You explain it will be best to freeze the gum. The procaine and adrenalin are there. You inject a big enough dose to kill. And incidentally he will not feel any lack of skill in your dentistry!

‘Completely unsuspecting, Amberiotis leaves. You bring out Morley’s body and arrange it on the floor, dragging it slightly on the carpet now that you have to manage it single-handed. You wipe the pistol and put it in his hand—wipe the door-handle so that your prints shall not be the last. The instruments you used have all been passed into the sterilizer. You leave the room, go down the stairs and slip out of the front door at a suitable moment. That is your only moment of danger.

‘It should all have passed off so well! Two people who threatened your safety—both dead. A third person also dead—but that, from your point of view, was unavoidable. And all so easily explained. Morley’s suicide explained by the mistake he had made over Amberiotis. The two deaths cancel out. One of these regrettable accidents.

‘But alas for you, I am on the scene. I have doubts. I make objections. All is not going as easily as you hoped. So there must be a second line of defences. There must be, if necessary, a scapegoat. You have already informed yourself minutely, of Morley’s household. There is this man, Frank Carter, he will do. So your accomplice arranges that he shall be engaged in a mysterious fashion as gardener. If, later, he tells such a ridiculous story no one will believe it. In due course, the body in the fur chest will come to light. At first it will be thought to be that of Miss Sainsbury Seale, then the dental evidence will be taken. Big sensation! It may seem a needless complication, but it was necessary . You do not want the police force of England to be looking for a missing Mrs Albert Chapman. No, let Mrs Chapman be dead—and let it be Mabelle Sainsbury Seale for whom the police look. Since they can never find her. Besides, through your influence, you can arrange to have the case dropped.

'You did do that, but since it was necessary that you should know just what I was doing, you sent for me and urged me to find the missing woman for you. And you continued, steadily, to "force a card" upon me. Your accomplice rang me up with a melodramatic warning—the same idea—espionage—the public aspect. She is a clever actress, this wife of yours, but to disguise one's voice the natural tendency is to imitate another voice. Your wife imitated the intonation of Mrs Olivera. That puzzled me, I may say, a good deal.

'Then I was taken down to Exsham—the final performance was staged. How easy to arrange a loaded pistol amongst laurels so that a man, clipping them, shall unwittingly cause it to go off. The pistol falls at his feet. Startled, he picks it up. What more do you want? He is caught red-handed—with a ridiculous story and with a pistol which is a twin to the one with which Morley was shot.

'And all a snare for the feet of Hercule Poirot.'

Alistair Blunt stirred a little in his chair. His face was grave and a little sad. He said:

'Don't misunderstand me, M. Poirot. How much do you guess? And how much do you actually know?'

Poirot said:

'I have a certificate of the marriage—at a registry office near Oxford—of Martin Alistair Blunt and Gerda Grant. Frank Carter saw two men leave Morley's surgery just after twenty-five past twelve. The first was a fat man—Amberiotis. The second was, of course, you. Frank Carter did not recognize you. He only saw you from above.'

'How fair of you to mention that!'

'He went into the surgery and found Morley's body. The hands were cold and there was dried blood round the wound. That meant that Morley had been dead some time. Therefore the dentist who attended to Amberiotis could not have been Morley and must have been Morley's murderer.'

'Anything else?'

'Yes. Helen Montessor was arrested this afternoon.'

Alistair Blunt gave one sharp movement. Then he sat very still. He said:

'That—rather tears it.'

Hercule Poirot said:

'Yes. The real Helen Montessor, your distant cousin, died in Canada seven years ago. You suppressed that fact, and took advantage of it.'

A smile came to Alistair Blunt's lips. He spoke naturally and with a kind of boyish enjoyment.

'Gerda got a kick out of it all, you know. I'd like to make you understand. You're such a clever fellow. I married her without letting my people know. She was acting in repertory at the time. My people were the strait-laced kind, and I was going into the firm. We agreed to keep it dark. She went on acting. Mabelle Sainsbury Seale was in the company too. She knew about us. Then she went abroad with a touring company. Gerda heard of her once or twice from India. Then she stopped writing. Mabelle got mixed up with some Hindu. She was always a stupid, credulous girl.

'I wish I could make you understand about my meeting with Rebecca and my marriage. Gerda understood. The only way I can put it is that it was like Royalty. I had the chance of marrying a Queen and playing the part of Prince Consort or even King. I looked on my marriage to Gerda as morganatic. I loved her. I didn't want to get rid of her. And the whole thing worked splendidly. I liked Rebecca immensely. She was a woman with a first-class financial brain and mine was just as good. We were good at team work. It was supremely exciting. She was an excellent companion and I think I made her happy. I was genuinely sorry when she died. The queer thing was that Gerda and I grew to enjoy the secret thrill of our meetings. We had all sorts of ingenious devices. She was an actress by nature.

She had a repertoire of seven or eight characters—Mrs Albert Chapman was only one of them. She was an American widow in Paris. I met her there when I went over on business. And she used to go to Norway with painting things as an artist. I went there for the fishing. And then, later, I passed her off as my cousin. Helen Montessor. It was great fun for us both, and it kept romance alive, I suppose. We could have married officially after Rebecca died—but we didn't want to. Gerda would have found it hard to live my official life and, of course, something from the past might have been raked up, but I think the real reason we went on more or less the same was that we enjoyed the secrecy of it. We should have found open domesticity dull.'

Blunt paused. He said, and his voice changed and hardened:

'And then that damned fool of a woman messed up everything. Recognizing me—after all those years!

And she told Amberiotis. You see—you must see—that something had to be done! It wasn't only myself—not only the selfish point of view. If I was ruined and disgraced—the country, my country was hit as well. For I've done something for England, M. Poirot. I've held it firm and kept it solvent. It's free from Dictators—from Fascism and from Communism. I don't really care for money as money. I do like power—I like to rule—but I don't want to tyrannize. We are democratic in England—truly democratic. We can grumble and say what we think and laugh at our politicians. We're free. I care for all that—it's been my life-work. But if I went—well, you know what would probably happen. I'm needed, M. Poirot. And a damned double-crossing, blackmailing rogue of a Greek was going to destroy my life work. Something had to be done. Gerda saw it, too. We were sorry about the Sainsbury Seale woman—but it was no good. We'd got to silence her. She couldn't be trusted to hold her tongue. Gerda went to see her, asked her to tea, told her to ask for Mrs Chapman, said she was staying in Mr Chapman's flat. Mabelle Sainsbury Seale came, quite unsuspecting. She never knew anything—the medal was in the tea—it's quite painless. You just sleep and don't wake up. The face business was done afterwards—rather sickening, but we felt it was necessary. Mrs Chapman was to exit for good. I had given my "cousin" Helen a cottage to live in. We decided that after a while we would get married. But first we had to get Amberiotis out of the way. It worked beautifully. He hadn't a suspicion that I wasn't a real dentist. I did my stuff with the hand-pricks rather well. I didn't risk the drill. Of course, after the injection he couldn't feel what I was doing. Probably just as well!'

Poirot asked:

'The pistols?'

'Actually they belonged to a secretary I once had in America. He bought them abroad somewhere. When he left he forgot to take them.'

There was a pause. Then Alistair Blunt asked:

'Is there anything else you want to know?'

Hercule Poirot said:

'What about Morley?'

Alistair Blunt said simply:

'I was sorry about Morley.'

Hercule Poirot said:

'Yes, I see...'

There was a long pause, then Blunt said:

'Well, M. Poirot, what about it?'

Poirot said:

'Helen Montessor is arrested already.'

'And now it's my turn?'

'That was my meaning, yes.'

Blunt said gently:

'But you are not happy about it, eh?'

'No, I am not at all happy.'

Alistair Blunt said:

'I've killed three people. So presumably I ought to be hanged. But you've heard my defence.'

'Which is—exactly?'

'That I believe, with all my heart and soul, that I am necessary to the continued peace and well-being of this country.'

Hercule Poirot allowed:

'That may be—yes.'

'You agree, don't you?'

'I agree, yes. You stand for all the things that to my mind are important. For sanity and balance and stability and honest dealing.'

Alistair Blunt said quietly:

'Thanks.'

He added:

'Well, what about it?'

'You suggest that I—retire from the case?'

'Yes.'

'And your wife?'

'I've got a good deal of pull. Mistaken identity, that's the line to take.'

'And if I refuse?'

'Then,' said Alistair Blunt simply, 'I'm for it.'

He went on:

'It's in your hands, Poirot. It's up to you. But I tell you this—and it's not just self-preservation—I'm needed in the world. And do you know why? Because I'm an honest man. And because I've got common sense—and no particular axe of my own to grind.'

Poirot nodded. Strangely enough, he believed all that.

He said:

‘Yes, that is one side. You are the right man in the right place. You have sanity, judgement, balance. But there is the other side. Three human beings who are dead.’

‘Yes, but think of them! Mabelle Sainsbury Seale—you said yourself—a woman with the brains of a hen! Amberiotis—a crook and a blackmailer!’

‘And Morley?’

‘I’ve told you before. I’m sorry about Morley. But after all—he was a decent fellow and a good dentist—but there are other dentists.’

‘Yes,’ said Poirot, ‘there are other dentists. And Frank Carter? You would have let him die, too, without regret?’

Blunt said:

‘I don’t waste any pity on him. He’s no good. An utter rotter.’

Poirot said:

‘But a human being...’

‘Oh well, we’re all human beings...’

‘Yes, we are all human beings. That is what you have not remembered. You have said that Mabelle Sainsbury Seale was a foolish human being and Amberiotis an evil one, and Frank Carter a wastrel—and Morley—Morley was only a dentist and there are other dentists. That is where you and I, M. Blunt, do not see alike. For to me the lives of those four people are just as important as your life.’

‘You’re wrong.’

‘No, I am not wrong. You are a man of great natural honesty and rectitude. You took one step aside—and outwardly it has not affected you. Publicly you have continued the same, upright, trustworthy, honest. But within you the love of power grew to overwhelming heights. So you sacrificed four human lives and thought them of no account.’

‘Don’t you realize, Poirot, that the safety and happiness of the whole nation depends on me?’

‘I am not concerned with nations, Monsieur. I am concerned with the lives of private individuals who have the right not to have their lives taken from them.’

He got up.

‘So that’s your answer,’ said Alistair Blunt.

Hercule Poirot said in a tired voice:

‘Yes—that is my answer...’

He went to the door and opened it. Two men came in.

II

Hercule Poirot went down to where a girl was waiting.

Jane Olivera, her face white and strained, stood against the mantelpiece. Beside her was Howard Raikes.

She said:

‘Well?’

Poirot said gently:

‘It is all over.’

Raikes said harshly:

‘What do you mean?’

Poirot said:

‘Mr Alistair Blunt has been arrested for murder.’

Raikes said:

‘I thought he’d buy you off...’

Jane said:

‘No. I never thought that.’

Poirot sighed. He said:

‘The world is yours. The New Heaven and the New Earth. In your new world, my children, let there be freedom and let there be pity... That is all I ask.’

Nineteen, Twenty,

My Plate’s Empty

Hercule Poirot walked home along the deserted streets.

An unobtrusive figure joined him.

‘Well?’ said Mr Barnes.

Hercule Poirot shrugged his shoulders and spread out his hands.

Barnes said:

‘What line did he take?’

‘He admitted everything and pleaded justification. He said that this country needed him.’

‘So it does,’ said Mr Barnes.

He added after a minute or two:

‘Don’t you think so?’

‘Yes, I do.’

‘Well, then—’

‘We may be wrong,’ said Hercule Poirot.

‘I never thought of that,’ said Mr Barnes. ‘So we may.’

They walked on for a little way, then Barnes asked curiously:

‘What are you thinking about?’

Hercule Poirot quoted:

‘Because thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, he hath also rejected thee from being king.’

‘Hm—I see—’ said Mr Barnes. ‘Saul—after the Amalekites. Yes, you could think of it that way.’

They walked on a little farther, then Barnes said:

‘I take the tube here. Good-night, Poirot.’ He paused, then said awkwardly: ‘You know—there’s something I’d like to tell you.’

‘Yes, mon ami?’

‘Feel I owe it to you. Led you astray unintentionally. Fact of the matter is, Albert Chapman, Q.X.912.’

‘Yes?’

‘I’m Albert Chapman. That’s partly why I was interested. I knew, you see, that I’d never had a wife.’

He hurried away, chuckling.

Poirot stood stock still. Then his eyes opened, his eyebrows rose. He said to himself:

‘Nineteen, twenty, my plate’s empty—’

And went home.

E-Book Extras

The Poirots

Essay by Charles Osborne

The Poirots

The Mysterious Affair at Styles;The Murder on the Links ;Poirot Investigates ;The Murder of Roger Ackroyd ;The Big Four ;The Mystery of the Blue Train ;Black Coffee ;Peril at End House ;Lord Edgware Dies ;Murder on the Orient Express ;Three-Act Tragedy ;Death in the Clouds ;The ABC

Murders ;Murder in Mesopotamia ;Cards on the Table ;Murder in the Mews ;Dumb Witness ;Death on the Nile ;Appointment with Death ;Hercule Poirot’s Christmas ;Sad Cypress ;One, Two, Buckle My Shoe ;Evil Under the Sun ;Five Little Pigs ;The Hollow ;The Labours of Hercules ;Taken at the Flood ; Mrs McGinty’s Dead ;After the Funeral ;Hickory Dickory Dock ;Dead Man’s Folly ;Cat Among the Pigeons ;The Adventure of the Christmas Pudding ;The Clocks ;Third Girl ;Hallowe’en Party ;Elephants Can Remember ;Poirot’s Early Cases ;Curtain: Poirot’s Last Case

1. The Mysterious Affair at Styles (1920)

Captain Arthur Hastings, invalided in the Great War, is recuperating as a guest of John Cavendish at Styles Court, the ‘country-place’ of John’s autocratic old aunt, Emily Inglethorpe—she of a sizeable fortune, and so recently remarried to a man twenty years her junior. When Emily’s sudden heart attack is found to be attributable to strychnine, Hastings recruits an old friend, now retired, to aid in the local investigation. With impeccable timing, Hercule Poirot, the renowned Belgian detective, makes his dramatic entrance into the pages of crime literature.

Of note: Written in 1916,The Mysterious Affair at Styles was Agatha Christie’s first published work. Six houses rejected the novel before it was finally published—after puzzling over it for eighteen months before deciding to go ahead—by The Bodley Head.

Times Literary Supplement: 'Almost too ingenious...very clearly and brightly told.'

2. The Murder on the Links (1923)

"For God's sake, come!" But by the time Hercule Poirot can respond to Monsieur Renault's plea, the millionaire is already dead—stabbed in the back, and lying in a freshly dug grave on the golf course adjoining his estate. There is no lack of suspects: his wife, whose dagger did the deed; his embittered son; Renault's mistress—and each feels deserving of the dead man's fortune. The police think they've found the culprit. Poirot has his doubts. And the discovery of a second, identically murdered corpse complicates matters considerably. (However, on a bright note, Captain Arthur Hastings does meet his future wife.)

35
17

The New York Times: 'A remarkably good detective story...warmly recommended.'

35
17

Literary Review: 'Really clever.'

35
17

Sketch: 'Agatha Christie never lets you down.'

3. Poirot Investigates (1924)

A movie star, a diamond; a murderous 'suicide'; a pharaoh's curse upon his tomb; a prime minister abducted...What links these fascinating cases? The brilliant deductive powers of Hercule Poirot in... 'The Adventure of the Western Star'; 'The Tragedy at Marsdon Manor'; 'The Adventure of the Cheap Flat'; 'The Mystery of the Hunter's Lodge'; 'The Million Dollar Bond Robbery'; 'The Adventure of the Egyptian Tomb'; 'The Jewel Robbery at the Grand Metropolitan'; 'The Kidnapped Prime Minister'; 'The Disappearance of Mr. Davenheim'; 'The Adventure of the Italian Nobleman'; 'The Case of the Missing Will.'

Of note: The stories collected here were first published in Sketch, beginning on March 7, 1923. Sketch also featured the first illustration of the foppish, egg-headed, elaborately moustachioed Belgian detective.

35
17

Literary Review: 'A capital collection...ingeniously constructed and told with an engaging lightness of style.'

35
17

Irish Times: 'In straight detective fiction there is still no one to touch [Christie].'

4. The Murder of Roger Ackroyd (1926)

In the quiet village of King's Abbot a widow's suicide has stirred suspicion—and dreadful gossip. There are rumours that she murdered her first husband, that she was being blackmailed, and that her secret lover was Roger Ackroyd. Then, on the verge of discovering the blackmailer's identity, Ackroyd himself is murdered. Hercule Poirot, who has settled in King's Abbot for some peace and quiet and a little gardening, finds himself at the centre of the case—and up against a diabolically clever and devious killer. Of note: The Murder of Roger Ackroyd broke all the rules of detective fiction and made Agatha Christie a household name. Widely regarded as her masterpiece (though perhaps it may be called her 'Poirot masterpiece' since other titles in her canon—notably And Then There Were None—are similarly acclaimed), The Murder of Roger Ackroyd was the source of some controversy when it was published. The Times Literary Supplement's praise of the first Poirot, The Mysterious Affair at Styles, 'almost too ingenious,' was applied by scores of readers to Ackroyd, who were nonetheless enraptured by the novel, and have remained so over the decades.

Fair warning: There are two things you must do if you know nothing of the book: discuss it with no one, and read it with all speed.

³⁵
₁₇

H.R.F. Keating: ‘One of the landmarks of detective literature’ (in his Crime & Mystery: The 100 Best Books).

³⁵
₁₇

Julian Symons: ‘The most brilliant of deceptions’ (in his Bloody Murder: From the Detective Story to the Crime Novel).

³⁵
₁₇

Irish Independent: ‘A classic—the book has worthily earned its fame.’

5. The Big Four (1927)

Hercule Poirot is preparing for a voyage to South America. Looming in the doorway of his bedroom is an uninvited guest, coated from head to foot in dust and mud. The man’s gaunt face registers Poirot for a moment, and then he collapses. The stranger recovers long enough to identify Poirot by name and madly and repeatedly scribble the figure ‘4’ on a piece of paper. Poirot cancels his trip. An investigation is in order. Fortunately, Poirot has the faithful Captain Hastings at his side as he plunges into a conspiracy of international scope—one that would consolidate power in the deadly cabal known as ‘The Big Four.’

6. The Mystery of the Blue Train (1928)

Le Train Bleu is an elegant, leisurely means of travel, and one certainly free of intrigue. Hercule Poirot is aboard, bound for the Riviera. And so is Ruth Kettering, the American heiress. Bailing out of a doomed marriage, she is en route to reconcile with her former lover. But her private affairs are made quite public when she is found murdered in her luxury compartment—bludgeoned almost beyond recognition. Fans of the later novel Murder on the Orient Express will not want to miss this journey by rail—and Poirot’s eerie reenactment of the crime...

7. Black Coffee (1930; 1998)

Sir Claud Amory’s formula for a powerful new explosive has been stolen, presumably by a member of his large household. Sir Claud assembles his suspects in the library and locks the door, instructing them that when the lights go out, the formula must be replaced on the table—and no questions will be asked. But when the lights come on, Sir Claud is dead. Now Hercule Poirot, assisted by Captain Hastings and Inspector Japp, must unravel a tangle of family feuds, old flames, and suspicious foreigners to find the killer and prevent a global catastrophe.

Of note: Black Coffee was Agatha Christie’s first playscript, written in 1929. It premiered in 1930 at the Embassy Theatre in Swiss Cottage, London, before transferring the following year to St Martin’s in the West End—a theatre made famous by virtue of its becoming the permanent home of the longest-running play in history, Agatha Christie’s The Mousetrap. Agatha Christie’s biographer, Charles Osborne, who, as a young actor in 1956 had played Dr Carelli in a Tunbridge Wells production of Black Coffee, adapted the play as this novel in 1998.

³⁵
₁₇

Antonia Fraser, Sunday Telegraph: ‘A lively and light-hearted read which will give pleasure to all those who have long wished that there was just one more Christie to devour.’

³⁵
₁₇

Mathew Prichard, from his Foreword to Black Coffee: ‘This Hercule Poirot murder mystery...reads like authentic, vintage Christie. I feel sure Agatha would be proud to have written it.’

8. Peril at End House (1932)

Nick is an unusual name for a pretty young woman. And Nick Buckley has been leading an unusual life of late. First, on a treacherous Cornish hillside, the brakes on her car fail. Then, on a coastal path, a falling boulder misses her by inches. Safe in bed, she is almost crushed by a painting. Upon discovering a bullet hole in Nick's sun hat, Hercule Poirot (who had come to Cornwall for a simple holiday with his friend Captain Hastings) decides that the girl needs his protection. At the same time, he begins to unravel the mystery of a murder that hasn't been committed. Yet.

35
17

Times Literary Supplement: 'Ingenious.'

9. Lord Edgware Dies (1933)

Poirot was present when the beautiful actress Jane Wilkinson bragged of her plan to 'get rid of' her estranged husband. Now the monstrous man is dead. But how could Jane have stabbed Lord Edgware in his library at exactly the time she was dining with friends? And what could have been her motive, since Edgware had finally granted her a divorce? The great Belgian detective, aided by Captain Hastings, can't help feeling that some kind of heinous stagecraft is in play. And does more murder wait in the wings?

35
17

The New York Times: 'A most ingenious crime puzzle.'

35
17

Times Literary Supplement: 'The whole case is a triumph of Poirot's special qualities.'

35
17

Noted crime fiction critic Julian Symons selected Lord Edgware Dies as one of Agatha Christie's best.

10. Murder on the Orient Express (1934)

Just after midnight, a snowstorm stops the Orient Express dead in its tracks in the middle of Yugoslavia. The luxurious train is surprisingly full for this time of year. But by morning there is one passenger less. A

'respectable American gentleman' lies dead in his compartment, stabbed a dozen times, his door locked from the inside...Hercule Poirot is also aboard, having arrived in the nick of time to claim a second-class compartment—and the most astounding case of his illustrious career. Regarding chronology: Agatha Christie seems not much concerned in the course of her books with their relationship to each other. It is why the Marples and the Poirots may be ready in any order, really, with pleasure. However, the dedicated Poirotist may wish to note that the great detective is returning from 'A little affair in Syria' at the start of Murder on the Orient Express. It is a piece of business after this 'little affair'—the investigation into the death of an archaeologist's wife—that is the subject of Murder in Mesopotamia (1936). If one wishes to delay a tad longer the pleasures of Orient Express, Murder in Mesopotamia offers no better opportunity.

Fair warning: Along these lines, it is advisable that one not read Cards on the Table (1936) prior to Orient Express, since Poirot himself casually gives away the ending to the latter novel. Of note: Murder on the Orient Express is one of Agatha Christie's most famous novels, owing no doubt to a combination of its romantic setting and the ingeniousness of its plot; its non-exploitative reference to the sensational kidnapping and murder of the infant son of Charles and Anne Morrow Lindbergh only two years prior; and a popular 1974 film adaptation, starring Albert Finney as Poirot—one of the few cinematic versions of a Christie work that met with the approval, however mild, of the author herself.

35
17

Dorothy L. Sayers, Sunday Times : 'A murder mystery conceived and carried out on the finest classical lines.'

³⁵
₁₇

Saturday Review of Literature: 'Hard to surpass.'

³⁵
₁₇

Times Literary Supplement: 'Need it be said—the little grey cells solve once more the seemingly insoluble. Mrs Christie makes an improbable tale very real, and keeps her readers enthralled and guessing to the end.'

11. Three-Act Tragedy (1935)

The novel opens as a theatre programme, with this telling credit: 'Illumination by HERCULE POIROT.'

Light must be shed, indeed, on the fateful dinner party staged by the famous actor Sir Charles Cartwright for thirteen guests. It will be a particularly unlucky evening for the mild-mannered Reverend Stephen Babbington, whose martini glass, sent for chemical analysis after he chokes on its contents and dies, reveals no trace of poison. Just as there is no apparent motive for his murder. The first scene in a succession of carefully staged killings, but who is the director?

³⁵
₁₇

The New York Times: 'Makes for uncommonly good reading.'

12. Death in the Clouds (1935)

From seat No. 9, Hercule Poirot is almost ideally placed to observe his fellow air travelers on this short flight from Paris to London. Over to his right sits a pretty young woman, clearly infatuated with the man opposite. Ahead, in seat No. 13, is the Countess of Horbury, horribly addicted to cocaine and not doing too good a job of concealing it. Across the gangway in seat No. 8, a writer of detective fiction is being troubled by an aggressive wasp. Yes, Poirot is almost ideally placed to take it all in—except that the passenger in the seat directly behind him has slumped over in the course of the flight...dead. Murdered. By someone in Poirot's immediate proximity. And Poirot himself must number among the suspects.

³⁵
₁₇

Times Literary Supplement: 'It will be a very acute reader who does not receive a complete surprise at the end.'

13. The ABC Murders (1936)

Captain Arthur Hastings returns to narrate this account of a personal challenge made to 'Mr Clever Poirot' by a killer who identifies himself as 'ABC' and who leaves the ABC Rail Guide next to his victims—apparently intending to work through the English countryside (he has struck in Andover, Bexhill-on-Sea, and Churston) and exercise Poirot along the way. Serialized in London's Daily Express, The ABC Murders became a cultural phenomenon as readers were invited to try to keep up with the famous Belgian detective. It is a challenge that remains fresh and thrilling to this day—and makes The ABC Murders one of the absolute must-reads of the Christie canon.

³⁵
₁₇

Julian Symons: 'A masterwork of carefully concealed artifice...most stunningly original.'

³⁵
₁₇

Sunday Times: 'There is no more cunning player of the murder game than Agatha Christie.'

14. Murder in Mesopotamia (1936)

Nurse Amy Leatheran had never felt the lure of the 'mysterious East,' but she nonetheless accepts an assignment at Hassanieh, an ancient site deep in the Iraqi desert, to care for the wife of a celebrated archaeologist. Mrs Leidner is suffering bizarre visions and nervous terror. 'I'm afraid of being killed!' she admits to her nurse. Her terror, unfortunately, is anything but unfounded, and Nurse Leatheran is soon enough without a patient. The world's greatest detective happens to be in the vicinity, however: having concluded an assignment in Syria, and curious about the dig at Hassanieh, Hercule Poirot arrives in time to lead a murder investigation that will tax even his remarkable powers—and in a part of the world that has seen more than its share of misadventure and foul play.

³⁵
17

The New York Times: 'Smooth, highly original, and completely absorbing.'

15. Cards on the Table (1936)

'The deduction,' Agatha Christie writes in her Foreword to this volume, 'must...be entirely psychological

...because when all is said and done it is the mind of the murderer that is of supreme interest.' There is probably no neater encapsulation of what makes Agatha Christie's works so fresh, so fascinating, so many years after they were written. And this statement appropriately opens the novel that is regarded as Agatha Christie's most singularly challenging mystery—it is, in fact, Hercule Poirot's own favourite case. Poirot is one of eight dinner guests of the flamboyant Mr Shaitana. The other invitees are Superintendent Battle of Scotland Yard (introduced in The Secret of Chimneys); Secret Service agent Colonel Race (who first appeared in The Man in the Brown Suit); Mrs Ariadne Oliver, a famous author of detective stories (introduced in Parker Pyne Investigates and who will figure in five more Poirots)—and four suspected murderers. After dinner, there will be a few rounds of bridge: the four investigators playing at one table; the four murder suspects at another. Mr Shaitana will sit by the fire and observe. This he does—until he is stabbed to death. The ultimate 'closed-room murder mystery' awaits the intrepid reader. Who is the murderer? And who will solve the crime?

Fair warning: Poirot casually reveals the solution to Murder on the Orient Express in Cards on the Table.

³⁵
17

Daily Mail: 'The finest murder story of her career...Mrs Christie has never been more ingenious.'

16. Murder in the Mews (1937)

In the title work in this collection of novellas, Poirot and Inspector Japp collaborate on the investigation of a suspicious suicide. The supernatural is said to play in the disappearance of top secret military plans in The Incredible Theft—an incredible claim, indeed, as Poirot will prove. The bullet that kills Gervase Chevenix-Gore shatters a mirror in Dead Man's Mirror—just the clue Poirot needs to solve the crime. And, while basking on white Mediterranean sands, Poirot stares trouble in the face—the beautiful face of Valentine Chantry, now celebrating her fifth marriage—in Triangle at Rhodes.

³⁵
17

Daily Mail: 'All four tales are admirable entertainment...Mrs Christie's solutions are unexpected and satisfying.'

17. Dumb Witness (1937)

Agatha Christie wrote this mystery for dog lovers. She was certainly one herself, dedicating the novel to her own pet. Captain Arthur Hastings, in his penultimate Poirot appearance (like Poirot, Curtain will be his last), again takes up narrative duties—along with, remarkably, the eponymous Bob, a wire-haired terrier who, upon careful inspection, declares Poirot 'not really a doggy person.' But Poirot is present to inquire into the natural-seeming death of Bob's mistress, Miss Emily Arundell. Natural-seeming, except that Miss Emily had written Poirot of her suspicions that a member of her family was trying to kill her: a letter Poirot received too late—in fact, two months too late—to help. Poirot and Bob will sniff out the murderer nonetheless (and Bob will win a happy new home, with Captain Hastings who is, most decidedly, a 'doggy person').

Fair warning: Dumb Witness is best read after The Mysterious Affair at Styles; The Murder of Roger Ackroyd; The Mystery of the Blue Train ; and Death in the Clouds —since the identity of the criminal in each is revealed in this novel.

³⁵₁₇

Glasgow Herald: ‘One of Poirot’s most brilliant achievements.’

18. Death on the Nile (1937)

Among the best-loved of Agatha Christie’s novels, Death on the Nile finds Hercule Poirot again trying to enjoy a vacation—this time aboard the S.S. Karnak , steaming between the First and Second Cataracts of the Nile, with stops at sites of archaeological significance. But Poirot (who, after all, had attempted to retire years before) seems to be perennially unlucky in his choice of holidays. Newlywed Linnet Ridgeway is, in the course of the journey, shot dead in the head, and Poirot has before him a boatload of suspects—and a useful sidekick in Colonel Race of the British Secret Service. Of note: The producers of Murder on the Orient Express released a film version, also well received (though not by Mrs Christie, who had passed away two years prior), of Death on the Nile (1978), this time casting Peter Ustinov as Poirot.

³⁵₁₇

Daily Mail (of the novel): ‘Flawless.’

19. Appointment with Death (1938)

“I’m so sorry,” she said... “Your mother is dead, Mr Boynton.” And curiously, as though from a great distance, she watched the faces of five people to whom that announcement meant freedom...’

We have returned to the Middle East with Hercule Poirot, on our most colourful tour yet: to the Dome of the Rock, the Judean desert, the Dead Sea, and to Petra, ‘the rose-red city,’ that ancient place of heart-stopping beauty—but also of heart-stopping horror, for here sits the corpse of old Mrs Boynton, monstrous matriarch, loathed by one and all. A tiny puncture mark on her wrist is the only sign of the fatal injection that killed her. With only twenty-four hours available to solve the mystery, Hercule Poirot recalls a chance remark he’d overheard back in Jerusalem: ‘You see, don’t you, that she’s got to be killed?’

³⁵₁₇

The Observer: ‘Twice as brilliant as Death on the Nile , which was entirely brilliant.’

20. Hercule Poirot’s Christmas (1938)

This novel was the author’s gift to her brother-in-law, who had complained that her stories were, for him, ‘too academic.’ What he desired was a ‘good violent murder with lots of blood.’ From the epigraph—a quotation from Macbeth —to its startling end, Agatha delivered a gift made to order. It is Christmas Eve. The Lee family reunion, never a lively affair, is interrupted by a deafening crash and a high-pitched scream. The tyrannical head of the Lee family, Simeon, lies dead in a pool of blood, his throat slashed. Hercule Poirot is spending the holidays with his friend Colonel Johnson, the chief constable of the local village. At the Lee house he finds an atmosphere not of mourning but of mutual suspicion. Christmas with family—survive it this year with Hercule Poirot. Fair warning: In an exchange between Poirot and Colonel Johnson, the solution of Three-Act Tragedy is revealed.

21. Sad Cypress (1940)

Beautiful, young Elinor Carlisle stands serenely in the dock, accused of the murder of Mary Gerrard, her rival in love. The evidence is damning: only Elinor had the motive, the opportunity, and the means to administer the fatal poison. Inside the hostile courtroom, one man is all that stands between Elinor and the gallows—Hercule Poirot.

³⁵₁₇

Daily Mail: ‘Poirot solves another exciting case.’

Charles Osborne, Agatha Christie' biographer: 'One of the most real, least schematic of crime novels. It is also unusual in that it employs the device of the possible miscarriage of justice...And it works superbly as a murder mystery.'

22. One, Two, Buckle My Shoe (1940)

'Nineteen, twenty, my plate's empty.' But the reader's plate is full indeed, as Hercule Poirot must follow a familiar nursery rhyme through a course of murder. The adventure is kicked off by the apparent suicide of a Harley Street dentist—who would also appear to have murdered one of his patients. Hercule Poirot has himself been this dentist's patient on this very day, and suspects foul play. A shoe buckle holds the key to the mystery. But—five, six—will Poirot pick up sticks, and—seven, eight—lay them straight...before a murderer can strike again?

The New York Times: 'A swift course of unflagging suspense leads to complete surprise.'

23. Evil Under the Sun (1941)

'There was that about her which made every other woman on the beach seem faded and insignificant. And with equal inevitability, the eye of every male present was drawn and riveted on her.'

Including Hercule Poirot's. She is Arlena Stuart, the famous actress, enjoying—like the famous detective—a summer holiday on Smugglers' Island, and she will become a common enough sight, sunbathing on the hot sands. Then one azure morning her beautiful bronzed body is discovered in an isolated cove, in the shade. She is dead, strangled. And Poirot, as luckless as ever when he attempts some down-time, will learn in the course of his investigation that nearly all the guests of this exclusive resort have some connection to Arlena. But who had the capacity and the motive to kill her?

Of note: The producers of Murder on the Orient Express and Death on the Nile released a film version of Evil Under the Sun in 1982; again, as in Nile, they cast Peter Ustinov as Poirot.

Daily Telegraph: 'Christie has never written anything better than Evil Under the Sun, which is detective story writing at its best.'

Times Literary Supplement: 'Christie springs her secret like a land mine.'

Sunday Times: 'Vivacious and entertaining.'

24. Five Little Pigs (1943)

A staggering bestseller upon its publication—running through 20,000 copies of its first edition—Five Little Pigs (published in the U.S. as Murder in Retrospect) concerns a murder committed sixteen years earlier. Carla Crale prevails upon Hercule Poirot to investigate the crime that sent her mother, Caroline, to prison for life (where she died). Caroline had been found guilty of poisoning her estranged husband, Carla's father, Amyas Crale, the famous artist. Poirot's investigation centers upon five suspects, still living, whom he convinces to speak to him and to record their own memories of the long-ago incident. Brilliantly intersplicing the past and the present, memory and reality, the search for truth and ongoing attempts to thwart it, Five Little Pigs has no antecedent. Almost a decade before Akira Kurosawa's famous film introduced the term "Rashomon effect" into the vernacular, Agatha Christie invited her readers to view a crime from multiple perspectives and to consider the vagaries of such an exercise. Fortunately, however, the great Belgian detective does not deal in vagaries—Hercule Poirot is in the business of precision, and he will reveal the identity of the true killer.

³⁵
₁₇

Observer: 'Mrs Christie as usual puts a ring through the reader's nose and leads him to one of her smashing last-minute showdowns.'

³⁵
₁₇

Times Literary Supplement: 'The answer to the riddle is brilliant.'

25. The Hollow (1946)

A murder tableau staged for Poirot's 'amusement' goes horribly wrong at The Hollow, the estate of Lady Lucy Angkatell, who has invited the great detective as her guest of honour. Dr John Christow was to have been 'shot' by his wife, Gerda, to 'expire' in a pool of blood-red paint. But when the shot is fired, it is deadly, and Dr. Christow's last gasp is of a name other than his wife's: 'Henrietta.' What was to have been a pleasant country weekend becomes instead one of Poirot's most baffling cases, with the revelation of a complex web of romantic attachments among the denizens of The Hollow. Of note: The phenomenon of The Mousetrap tends to distract from Agatha Christie's other stage successes. An adaptation of The Hollow was one such triumph, premiering in Cambridge in 1951 and subsequently playing for over a year in the West End. Poirot, however, is not a character in the stage version—the diminutive Belgian with the oversized personality was replaced by a perfectly neutral Scotland Yard inspector. In her Autobiography, Mrs Christie notes that she wishes she had made a similar swap in the novel—so rich are the characters in The Hollow—but Poirot fans then (The Hollow was a tremendous bestseller) and today would have it no other way.

³⁵
₁₇

San Francisco Chronicle (of the novel): 'A grade-A plot—the best Christie in years.'

26. The Labours of Hercules (1967)

Dr Burton, Fellow of All Souls, sipping Poirot's Chateau Mouton Rothschild, offers up a rather unkind remark about his host that sets in motion Hercule Poirot's obsessive, self-imposed contest against his classical namesake: Poirot will accept twelve labours—twelve fiendishly complex cases—and then, at long last, genuinely unshoulder the burdens of the hero: he will retire, and leave the ridding of society's monsters, the sweeping of its criminal stables, to others. The cases that Poirot engages are every bit as taxing of his mighty brain as were the famous labours imposed by Eurystheus, King of Tiryns, on the Greek demi-god's brawn, and they make for one of the most fascinating books in the Christie canon. (Poirot solves them all but, of course, retirement remains as elusive as ever.)

³⁵
₁₇

Sunday Express: 'Twelve little masterpieces of detection. Poirot and Agatha Christie at their inimitable best.'

³⁵
₁₇

Margery Allingham: 'I have often thought that Mrs Christie was not so much the best as the only living writer of the true classic detective story.'

³⁵
₁₇

San Francisco Chronicle: 'A finely shaped book, richly devious and quite brilliant.'

27. Taken at the Flood (1948)

A few weeks after marrying an attractive young widow, Rosaleen Underhay, Gordon Cloade dies in the Blitz—leaving Rosaleen in sole possession of the Cloade family fortune. 'Ill will' is in the air, generally, with the close of the war, and it positively contaminates the Cloade household. Now that contamination threatens Poirot—in the form of a visit from the dead man's sister-in-law. 'Guided' to Poirot 'by those beyond the veil,' she insists that Rosaleen is not a widow at all. Though he is no subscriber to the supernatural, Poirot has indeed heard of the somewhat notorious Rosaleen, and he is drawn, seemingly inevitably, to the case when he reads of the death of one Enoch Arden—who had appeared mysteriously in the village of Warmesley Vale, not far from the Cloade family seat. Poirot must investigate—but does he go to Warmesley Vale to bring Rosaleen to justice, or to spare her being dispatched prematurely to 'the other side'?

Of note: Taken at the Flood marks the debut of Superintendent Spence, a Poirot sidekick who will feature in three more Poirot novels.

³⁵
₁₇

Elizabeth Bowen, The Tatler: 'One of the best... Her gift for blending the cosy with the macabre has seldom been more in evidence than it is here.'

³⁵
₁₇

Manchester Evening News: 'Told briskly, vivaciously, and with ever-fertile imagination.'

³⁵
₁₇

New York Herald Tribune: 'Don't miss it.'

28. Mrs McGinty's Dead (1952)

'Mrs McGinty's dead!' / 'How did she die?' / 'Down on one knee, just like I!' So goes the old children's rhyme. A crushing blow to the back of the head kills a real-life Mrs McGinty in her cottage in the village of Broadhinny—Superintendent Spence's jurisdiction. Then the killer tore up the floorboards in search of... what? Justice presumes a pittance of cash; and justice has condemned James Bentley, her loathsome lodger, to hang for the crime. But Superintendent Spence is not satisfied with the verdict, and appeals to Poirot to investigate—and save the life of the wretch Bentley. Of note: Crime novelist Ariadne Oliver, of Cards on the Table, returns to help Poirot and Spence solve the crime.

³⁵
₁₇

Sunday Times: 'So simple, so economical, so completely baffling. Each clue scrupulously given, with superb sleight of hand.'

³⁵
₁₇

San Francisco Chronicle: 'The plot is perfect and the characters are wonderful.'

³⁵
₁₇

The New York Times: 'The best Poirot since... Cards on the Table.'

29. After the Funeral (1953)

Mrs Cora Lansquenet admits to 'always saying the wrong thing'—but this last remark has gotten her a hatchet in the head. 'He was murdered, wasn't he?' she had said after the funeral of her brother, Richard Abernethie, in the presence of the family solicitor, Mr Entwistle, and the assembled Abernethies, who are anxious to know how Richard's sizable fortune will be distributed. Entwistle, desperate not to lose any more clients to murder, turns to Hercule Poirot for help. A killer complicates an already very complicated family—classic Christie; pure Poirot.

³⁵
₁₇

Liverpool Post: 'Keeps us guessing—and guessing wrongly—to the very last page.'

30. Hickory Dickory Dock (1955)

An outbreak of kleptomania at a student hostel is not normally the sort of crime that arouses Hercule Poirot's interest. But when it affects the work of his secretary, Miss Lemon, whose sister works at the hostel, he agrees to look into the matter. The matter becomes a bona fide mystery when Poirot peruses the bizarre list of stolen and vandalized items—including a stethoscope, some old flannel trousers, a box of chocolates, a slashed rucksack, and a diamond ring found in a bowl of a soup. 'A unique and beautiful problem,' the great detective declares. Unfortunately, this 'beautiful problem' is not just one of thievery and mischief—for there is a killer on the loose.

³⁵
₁₇

Times Literary Supplement: 'An event...There is plenty of entertainment.'

³⁵
₁₇

The New York Times: 'The Christie fan of longest standing, who thinks he knows every one of her tricks, will still be surprised by...the twists here.'

31. Dead Man's Folly (1956)

Sir George and Lady Stubbs desire to host a village fete with a difference—a mock murder mystery. In good faith, Ariadne Oliver, the much-lauded crime novelist, agrees to organise the proceedings. As the event draws near, however, Ariadne senses that something sinister is about to happen—and calls upon her old friend Hercule Poirot to come down to Dartmoor for the festivities. Ariadne's instincts, alas, are right on the money, and soon enough Poirot has a real murder to investigate.

³⁵
₁₇

The New York Times: 'The infallibly original Agatha Christie has come up, once again, with a new and highly ingenious puzzle-construction.'

³⁵
₁₇

Times Literary Supplement: 'The solution is of the colossal ingenuity we have been conditioned to expect.'

32. Cat Among the Pigeons (1959)

A revolution in the Middle East has a direct and deadly impact upon the summer term at Meadowbank, a picture-perfect girls' school in the English countryside. Prince Ali Yusuf, Hereditary Sheikh of Ramat, whose great liberalizing experiment—'hospitals, schools, a Health Service'—is coming to chaos, knows that he must prepare for the day of his exile. He asks his pilot and school friend, Bob Rawlinson, to care for a packet of jewels. Rawlinson does so, hiding them among the possessions of his niece, Jennifer Sutcliffe, who is bound for Meadowbank. Rawlinson is killed before he can reveal the hiding place—or even the fact that he has employed his niece as a smuggler. But someone knows, or suspects, that Jennifer has the jewels. As murder strikes Meadowbank, only Hercule Poirot can restore the peace. Of note: In this novel we meet Colonel Pikeaway, later to appear in the non-Poirot Passenger to Frankfurt and Postern of Fate, and we meet the financier Mr Robinson, who will also appear in Postern of Fate and who will show up at Miss Marple's Bertram's Hotel.

³⁵
₁₇

Daily Express, of Cat Among the Pigeons: 'Immensely enjoyable.'

³⁵
₁₇

The New York Times: 'To read Agatha Christie at her best is to experience the rarefied pleasure of watching a faultless technician at work, and she is in top form in Cat Among the Pigeons.'

33. The Adventure of the Christmas Pudding (1960)

'This book of Christmas fare may be described as "The Chef's Selection." I am the Chef!' Agatha Christie writes in her Foreword, in which she also recalls the delightful Christmases of her youth at Abney Hall in the north of England. But while the author's Christmases were uninterrupted by murder, her famous detective's are not (see also Hercule Poirot's Christmas). In the title novella, Poirot—who has been coerced into attending 'an old-fashioned Christmas in the English countryside'—gets all the trimmings, certainly, but he also gets a woman's corpse in the snow, a Kurdish knife spreading a crimson stain across her white fur wrap.

Collected within: The Adventure of the Christmas Pudding (novella); 'The Mystery of the Spanish Chest'; The Under Dog (novella); 'Four-and-Twenty Blackbirds'; 'The Dream'; and a Miss Marple mystery, 'Greenshaw's Folly.'

³⁵
₁₇

Times Literary Supplement: 'There is the irresistible simplicity and buoyancy of a Christmas treat about it all.'

34. The Clocks (1963)

Sheila Webb, typist-for-hire, has arrived at 19 Wilbraham Crescent in the seaside town of Crowdean to accept a new job. What she finds is a well-dressed corpse surrounded by five clocks. Mrs Pebmarsh, the blind owner of No. 19, denies all knowledge of ringing Sheila's secretarial agency and asking for her by name—yet someone did. Nor does she own that many clocks. And neither woman seems to know the victim. Colin Lamb, a young intelligence specialist working a case of his own at the nearby naval yard, happens to be on the scene at the time of Sheila Webb's ghastly discovery. Lamb knows of only one man who can properly investigate a crime as bizarre and baffling as what happened inside No. 19—his friend and mentor, Hercule Poirot.

³⁵
₁₇

The New York Times: 'Here is the grand-manner detective story in all its glory.'

³⁵
₁₇

The Bookman: 'Superlative Christie...extremely ingenious.'

³⁵
₁₇

Saturday Review: 'A sure-fire attention-gripper—naturally.'

35. Third Girl (1966)

Hercule Poirot is interrupted at breakfast by a young woman who wishes to consult with the great detective about a murder she 'might have' committed—but upon being introduced to Poirot, the girl flees. And disappears. She has shared a flat with two seemingly ordinary young women. As Hercule Poirot—with the aid of the crime novelist Mrs Ariadne Oliver—learns more about this mysterious 'third girl,' he hears rumours of revolvers, flick-knives, and blood-stains. Even if a murder might not have been committed, something is seriously wrong, and it will take all of Poirot's wits and tenacity to establish whether the 'third girl' is guilty, innocent, or insane.

³⁵
₁₇

Sunday Telegraph: 'First-class Christie.'

³⁵
₁₇

Financial Times: 'Mesmerising ingenuity.'

36. Hallowe'en Party (1969)

Mystery writer Ariadne Oliver has been invited to a Hallowe'en party at Woodleigh Common. One of the other guests is an adolescent girl known for telling tall tales of murder and intrigue—and for being generally unpleasant. But when the girl, Joyce, is found drowned in an apple-bob-bing tub, Mrs Oliver wonders after the fictional nature of the girl's claim that she had once witnessed a murder. Which of the party guests wanted to keep her quiet is a question for Ariadne's friend Hercule Poirot. But unmasking a killer this Hallowe'en is not going to be easy—for there isn't a soul in Woodleigh who believes the late little storyteller was actually murdered.

35
17

Daily Mirror: 'A thundering success...a triumph for Hercule Poirot.'

37. Elephants Can Remember (1972)

'The Ravenscrofts didn't seem that kind of person. They seemed well balanced and placid.'

And yet, twelve years earlier, the husband had shot the wife, and then himself—or perhaps it was the other way around, since sets of both of their fingerprints were on the gun, and the gun had fallen between them. The case haunts Ariadne Oliver, who had been a friend of the couple. The famous mystery novelist desires this real-life mystery solved, and calls upon Hercule Poirot to help her do so. Old sins have long shadows, the proverb goes. Poirot is now a very old man, but his mind is as nimble and as sharp as ever and can still penetrate deep into the shadows. But as Poirot and Mrs Oliver and Superintendent Spence reopen the long-closed case, a startling discovery awaits them. And if memory serves Poirot (and it does!), crime—like history—has a tendency to repeat itself.

35
17

The Times: 'Splendid.'

38. Poirot's Early Cases (1974)

With his career still in its formative years, we learn many things about how Poirot came to exercise those famous 'grey cells' so well. Fourteen of the eighteen stories collected herein are narrated by Captain Arthur Hastings—including what would appear to be the earliest Poirot short story, 'The Affair at the Victory Ball,' which follows soon on the events of The Mysterious Affair at Styles. Two of the stories are narrated by Poirot himself, to Hastings. One, 'The Chocolate Box,' concerns Poirot's early days on the Belgian police force, and the case that was his greatest failure: 'My grey cells, they functioned not at all,'

Poirot admits. But otherwise, in this most fascinating collection, they function brilliantly, Poirot's grey cells, challenging the reader to keep pace at every twist and turn. Collected within: 'The Affair at the Victory Ball'; 'The Adventure of the Clapham Cook'; 'The Cornish Mystery'; 'The Adventure of Johnnie Waverly'; 'The Double Clue'; 'The King of Clubs'; 'The Lemesurier Inheritance'; 'The Lost Mine'; 'The Plymouth Express'; 'The Chocolate Box'; 'The Submarine Plans'; 'The Third-Floor Flat'; 'Double Sin'; 'The Market Basing Mystery'; 'Wasps' Nest';

'The Veiled Lady'; 'Problem at Sea'; 'How Does Your Garden Grow?'

35
17

Sunday Express: 'Superb, vintage Christie.'

39. Curtain: Poirot's Last Case (1975)

Captain Arthur Hastings narrates. Poirot investigates. 'This, Hastings, will be my last case,' declares the detective who had entered the scene as a retiree in The Mysterious Affair at Styles, the captain's, and our, first encounter with the now-legendary Belgian detective. Poirot promises that, 'It will be, too, my most interesting case—and my most interesting criminal. For in X we have a technique superb, magnificent...X has operated with so much ability that he has defeated me, Hercule Poirot!' The setting is, appropriately, Styles Court, which has since been converted into a private hotel. And under this same roof is X, a murderer five-times over; a murderer by no means finished murdering. In Curtain, Poirot will, at last, retire—death comes as the end. And he will bequeath to his dear friend Hastings an astounding revelation. 'The ending of Curtain is one of the most surprising that Agatha Christie ever devised,' writes her biographer, Charles Osborne.

Of note: On 6 August 1975, upon the publication of Curtain, The New York Times ran a front-page obituary of Hercule Poirot, complete with photograph. The passing of no other fictional character had been so acknowledged in America's 'paper of record.' Agatha Christie had always intended Curtain to be 'Poirot's Last Case': Having written the novel during the Blitz, she stored it (heavily insured) in a bank vault till the time that she, herself, would retire. Agatha Christie died on 12 January 1976.

³⁵
17

Time: 'First-rate Christie: fast, complicated, wryly funny.'

Charles Osborne on

One, Two, Buckle My Shoe

Alternative Title: The Patriotic Murders

Poirot (1940)

A highly successful example of the murder mystery inspired by nursery rhyme, the category which Agatha Christie virtually invented and certainly made her speciality, One, Two, Buckle My Shoe is prefaced by the rhyme itself:

One, two, buckle my shoe,

Three, four, shut the door,

Five, six, pick up sticks,⁴

Seven, eight, lay them straight,

Nine, ten, a good fat hen,

Eleven, twelve, men must delve,

Thirteen, fourteen, maids are courting,

Fifteen, sixteen, maids in the kitchen,

Seventeen, eighteen, maids in waiting,

Nineteen, twenty, my plate's empty.

Each of the novel's ten chapters corresponds, loosely, to a line of the verse: the shoe buckle of the first line is not without significance. The first person to die is an apparently harmless London dentist, with a fashionable practice in Harley Street. He is at first thought to have committed suicide, but he seemed in good spirits when Hercule Poirot was a patient in his chair an hour or so before his death, and so Poirot joins his old colleague Chief Inspector Japp in investigating the affair, which soon proves to have wider ramifications than were at first foreseen. International politics may be involved, hence the change of title for US publication to The Patriotic Murders. (An American paperback reprint in 1953 used a third title: An Overdose of Death.)

This is one of those Christie crime novels whose donnée the reader would be wise to scrutinize very closely, for things are not necessarily what they seem. The plot is a particularly complicated one but is clearly and unconfusingly presented, except at moments when Mrs. Christie intends to confuse. References to politics and to international intrigue abound, but they are both more specific and somewhat more sophisticated than in such Agatha Christie thrillers of the twenties as The Seven Dials Mystery and The Big Four. Left-wing agitators are more lightly satirized, conservative financiers no longer have to be treated as sacrosanct, both 'the Reds' and 'our Blackshirted friends' (Mosley's Fascists) are seen as threats to democracy, and there is even a mention of the IRA. References are to the real world of 1939, teetering on the brink of war, and not to a cosily recalled, more stable past. It is odd, surely, that Poirot, who has elsewhere described himself as bon catholique, should have known his way around the Anglican forms of service sufficiently to take part, even if 'in a hesitant baritone', in the chanting of Psalm 140 when he accompanies a family to morning prayers in the parish church. 'The proud hath laid a snare for me,' he sang, 'and spread a net with cards; yea, and set traps in my way,' and suddenly he sees clearly the trap into which he had so nearly fallen. It is comforting to think that Poirot has derived some benefit from his visit, for this is the only church service he is known to have attended in the course of his abnormally long career.

Walking through Regent's Park at one point in the story, Poirot notices young lovers sitting under 'nearly every tree'. He compared the figures of the 'little London girls' unfavourably with that of the Countess Vera Rossokoff, a Russian aristocrat and thief whose path had crossed his many years earlier in The Big Four, and who has lingered in his thoughts and dreams ever since. The Countess plays no part in One, Two, Buckle My Shoe, but she will appear again, seven years later, in The Labours of Hercules. Elsewhere during his investigation Poirot recalls another of his cases, one 'that he had named the Case of the Augean Stables'. This, along with the other labours of Hercules, had not yet been collected into a volume, but will be found in 1947's The Labours of Hercules.

A television adaptation of One, Two, Buckle My Shoe, with David Suchet as Poirot, was first transmitted on London Weekend TV on 19 January 1992.

About Charles Osborne

This essay was adapted from Charles Osborne's The Life and Crimes of Agatha Christie: A Biographical Companion to the Works of Agatha Christie (1982, rev. 1999). Mr. Osborne was born in Brisbane in 1927. He is known internationally as an authority on opera, and has written a number of books on musical and literary subjects, among them The Complete Operas of Verdi (1969); Wagner and His World (1977); and W.H. Auden: The Life of a Poet (1980). An addict of crime fiction and the world's leading authority on Agatha Christie, Charles Osborne adapted the Christie plays Black Coffee (Poirot); Spider's Web; and The Unexpected Guest into novels. He lives in London.

About Agatha Christie

Agatha Christie is known throughout the world as the Queen of Crime. Her books have sold over a billion copies in English and another billion in 100 foreign languages. She is the most widely published author of all time and in any language, outsold only by the Bible and Shakespeare. Mrs Christie is the author of eighty crime novels and short story collections, nineteen plays, and six novels written under the name of Mary Westmacott.

Agatha Christie's first novel, The Mysterious Affair at Styles, was written towards the end of World War I (during which she served in the Voluntary Aid Detachments). In it she created Hercule Poirot, the little Belgian investigator who was destined to become the most popular detective in crime fiction since Sherlock Holmes. After having been rejected by a number of houses, The Mysterious Affair at Styles was eventually published by The Bodley Head in 1920.

In 1926, now averaging a book a year, Agatha Christie wrote her masterpiece. The Murder of Roger Ackroyd was the first of her books to be published by William Collins and marked the beginning of an author-publisher relationship that lasted for fifty years and produced over seventy books. The Murder of Roger Ackroyd was also the first of Agatha Christie's works to be dramatised—as Alibi—and to have a successful run in London's West End. The Mousetrap, her most famous play, opened in 1952 and runs to this day at St Martin's Theatre in the West End; it is the longest-running play in history. Agatha Christie was made a Dame in 1971. She died in 1976, since when a number of her books have been published: the bestselling novel Sleeping Murder appeared in 1976, followed by An Autobiography and the short story collections Miss Marple's Final Cases; Problem at Pollensa Bay; and While the Light Lasts. In 1998, Black Coffee was the first of her plays to be novelised by Charles Osborne, Mrs Christie's biographer.

The Agatha Christie Collection

Christie Crime Classics

The Man in the Brown Suit

The Secret of Chimneys

The Seven Dials Mystery
The Mysterious Mr Quin
The Sittaford Mystery
The Hound of Death
The Listerdale Mystery
Why Didn't They Ask Evans?
Parker Pyne Investigates
Murder Is Easy
And Then There Were None
Towards Zero
Death Comes as the End
Sparkling Cyanide
Crooked House
They Came to Baghdad
Destination Unknown
Spider's Web *
The Unexpected Guest *
Ordeal by Innocence
The Pale Horse
Endless Night
Passenger To Frankfurt
Problem at Pollensa Bay
While the Light Lasts
Hercule Poirot Investigates
The Mysterious Affair at Styles
The Murder on the Links
Poirot Investigates
The Murder of Roger Ackroyd
The Big Four
The Mystery of the Blue Train

Black Coffee *

Peril at End House

Lord Edgware Dies

Murder on the Orient Express

Three-Act Tragedy

Death in the Clouds

The ABC Murders

Murder in Mesopotamia

Cards on the Table

Murder in the Mews

Dumb Witness

Death on the Nile

Appointment with Death

Hercule Poirot's Christmas

Sad Cypress

One, Two, Buckle My Shoe

Evil Under the Sun

Five Little Pigs

The Hollow

The Labours of Hercules

Taken at the Flood

Mrs McGinty's Dead

After the Funeral

Hickory Dickory Dock

Dead Man's Folly

Cat Among the Pigeons

The Adventure of the Christmas Pudding

The Clocks

Third Girl

Hallowe'en Party

Elephants Can Remember
Poirot's Early Cases
Curtain: Poirot's Last Case
Miss Marple Mysteries
The Murder at the Vicarage
The Thirteen Problems
The Body in the Library
The Moving Finger
A Murder Is Announced
They Do It with Mirrors
A Pocket Full of Rye
4.50 from Paddington
The Mirror Crack'd from Side to Side
A Caribbean Mystery
At Bertram's Hotel
Nemesis
Sleeping Murder
Miss Marple's Final Cases
Tommy & Tuppence
The Secret Adversary
Partners in Crime
N or M?
By the Pricking of My Thumbs
Postern of Fate
Published as Mary Westmacott
Giant's Bread
Unfinished Portrait
Absent in the Spring
The Rose and the Yew Tree
A Daughter's a Daughter

The Burden

Memoirs

An Autobiography

Come, Tell Me How You Live

Play Collections

The Mousetrap and Selected Plays

Witness for the Prosecution and Selected Plays

* novelised by Charles Osborne

www.agathachristie.com

For more information about Agatha Christie, please visit the official website. ONE, TWO, BUCKLE MY SHOEBY
Agatha Christie

Copyright © 1940 Agatha Christie Limited (a Chorion company)

“Essay by Charles Osborne” excerpted from The Life and Crimes of Agatha Christie. Copyright ©

1982, 1999 by Charles Osborne. Reprinted with permission.

All rights reserved under International and Pan-American Copyright Conventions. By payment of the required fees, you have been granted the non-exclusive, non-transferable right to access and read the text of this e-book on-screen. No part of this text may be reproduced, transmitted, downloaded, decompiled, reverse engineered, or stored in or introduced into any information storage and retrieval system, in any form or by any means, whether electronic or mechanical, now known or hereinafter invented, without the express written permission of PerfectBound™. PerfectBound™ and the PerfectBound™ logo are trademarks of HarperCollins Publishers, Inc. Microsoft Reader edition published November 2004 ISBN 0-06-079778-9

This e-book was set from the Agatha Christie Signature Edition published 2002

10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2

First published in Great Britain by Collins 1940

For more information about Agatha Christie e-books visit www.perfectbound.com/agathachristie About the Publisher

Australia

HarperCollins Publishers (Australia) Pty. Ltd.

25 Ryde Road (PO Box 321)

Pymble, NSW 2073, Australia

<http://www.perfectbound.com.au>

Canada

HarperCollins Publishers Ltd.

55 Avenue Road, Suite 2900

Toronto, ON, M5R, 3L2, Canada

<http://www.perfectbound.ca>

New Zealand

HarperCollinsPublishers (New Zealand) Limited

P.O. Box 1

Auckland, New Zealand

<http://www.harpercollins.co.nz>

United Kingdom

HarperCollins Publishers Ltd.

77-85 Fulham Palace Road

London, W6 8JB, UK

<http://www.uk.perfectbound.com>

United States

HarperCollins Publishers Inc.

10 East 53rd Street

New York, NY 10022

<http://www.perfectbound.com>

For more information about Agatha Christie e-books visit www.perfectbound.com/agathachristie About this Title

This eBook was created using ReaderWorks™ Publisher Preview, produced by OverDrive, Inc. For more information on ReaderWorks, visit us on the Web at "www.readerworks.com"

Table of Contents

Start